INTRODUCTION

This report is the thirty-eighth annual publication in the series, Labour Organization in Canada. The purpose of this series is to provide each year statistical information on trade union membership in Canada as well as a directory of the unions and of the delegate organizations formed by these unions.*

The statistical information in this report was compiled from information submitted to the Department of Labour by the unions. Two questionnaires were used for this purpose. The first of these was completed by the national and international offices of the union, and it is from this report that the national membership figures were taken.

The second questionnaire is directed to local union branches throughout the country. The reports from this source provide the basis for a statistical series showing the geographical and sex distribution of trade union membership in Canada. The coverage from this source is, however, incomplete and consequently the results must be regarded as forming a separate statistical series from the national figures. All figures are as of December thirty-first of the year under discussion.

From the information on both sets of replies a list is made up of the unions active in Canada, of the location of local branches and of the union officials.

The total membership of trade unions in Canada as reported to the Department for the year 1948 was 977,594. This represented an increase of slightly more than seven per cent during the year 1948 and more than seventeen per cent in the two-year period 1947-1948.

The local branches of unions together with the local unions reported 810,916 members or, in other words 83 per cent of the total union membership in the country was covered by these replies. The number of branches reporting was 4,316 or 84 per cent of the 5,114 branches existing in Canada at the close of 1948.

Broadly speaking, the unions are of four groups. The first and largest of these is made up of international unions with active branches existing in Canada, the headquarters of which are in the United States. A second and smaller group

* Prior to 1941, these Annual Reports included a directory which listed each local trade union or branch according to name and location and gave the names and addresses of presidents and secretaries. Although this directory has not been included in recent reports, it is kept up to date in the Economics and Research Branch of the Department of Labour.

includes the national unions which are purely Canadian in scope. Thirdly, there are local unions directly chartered by central labour federations and congresses. And finally, there is a group composed of wholly independent organizations. The size of each of these four groups is shown in Table I.

The great majority of unions in Canada are affiliated with a central labour body. The two largest congresses are the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. Each of these organizations has several international unions among its affiliates. Those affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States are usually affiliated with the T.L.C. in Canada as are the directly chartered locals of the A.F.L. which are located in this country. The affiliates of the Congress of Industrial Organizations are usually affiliates of the C.C.L. Some international unions remain independent of either Canadian body. The remaining federations are the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, whose members are practically all located in the Province of Quebec, the Canadian Federation of Labour, the National Council of Canadian Labour, the One Big Union, which has members in Winnipeg and vicinity, and the Industrial Workers of the World which charts local unions having no affiliation with national or international unions.

Of the international unions not affiliated with either of the Canadian Congresses, the most important are the four railroad brotherhoods of engineers, firemen and enginemen, conductors, and trainmen. Among the remaining railway unions in Canada, most are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States and the Trades and Labour Congress in Canada, the principal exception being the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers which is affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour.

The following report includes information on all the unions and their central labour bodies. These data are preceded by a short account of the development of the Canadian trade union movement from its early beginnings to its present status.

I. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Labour organization existing in Canada before the middle of the 19th Century was largely made up of trade associations consisting usually of the workers of a single craft in one locality. It is believed that the first such union in Canada was formed in Nova Scotia by immigrant printers from Great Britain. The first union of which there is any definite record, however, is a boot and shoe workers' organization which was active in Montreal around 1827. It is also known that printers' unions were formed in Quebec City in 1827, in Toronto during 1832 and in Hamilton and Montreal just one year later.

The number of Canadian unions increased rapidly from 1850 to 1874. This growth was stimulated both by the industrial expansion in this country and by the rapid progress of the trade union movement in Great Britain and in the United States. The former country set the pace in progressive legislation and the latter provided the lead in developing the machinery for labour organization. During the same period Canadian local unions began to affiliate with the central organizations of their respective crafts located in the United States. The iron moulders and printers appear to have been pioneers in this trend toward establishing branches of the "international" trade unions in Canada. When the National Union of Iron Moulders was formed at Philadelphia in 1859, there were moulders' unions in Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford, London and Quebec, which in the following year affiliated with the American union. (The present name, International Moulders and Foundry Workers' Union of North America was not adopted until 1940). In 1865 the Typographical Union in Saint John, N.B., affiliated with the National Typographical Union which had been organized in the United States in 1852. Later in that same year, the printers' union in Toronto joined the larger union and it was at this time that the name was changed to the International Typographical Union.

International railway lines facilitated the formation of international unions in the railroad industry. Engineers and conductors were organized in the sixties, the firemen in 1873 and the trainmen in the early eighties. These four important international unions have continued to the present time to remain outside of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States, and their Canadian branches have remained apart from the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour. At the present time most of the local unions in Canada are branches of international organizations which have their headquarters in the United States.

The prosperous sixties encouraged the formation of national unions in the United States with which Canadian local unions joined. The unions in Canada also began to draw together to press for a nine-hour day and for favourable labour legislation. In 1871 representatives from 15 local unions formed the Toronto Trades Assembly. Two years later, at a meeting in Toronto called by the Assembly and attended by delegates from 30 locals in eight Ontario towns, the Canadian Labour Union was formed and further meetings took place annually from 1873 to 1877 inclusive. During that time the Canadian Labour Union was influential in obtaining more favourable labour legislation both in Ontario and in the Dominion. The Canadian Labour Union and its central councils in Toronto, Ottawa and Hamilton disappeared during the severe business depression in the seventies.

In 1883 a second attempt was made to establish a Canadian central organization, when the Toronto Trades and Labour Council invited the trade unions and the Knights of Labour assemblies* of the Dominion to convene in Toronto for the organization of the Canadian Trades and Labour Congress. The Congress was established on a permanent basis at the second meeting in 1886 and met annually from 1887 to 1892 as the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress; in 1893 it assumed its present name, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

A meeting of far-reaching importance to trade unions in the United States and Canada was convened at Terre Haute, Indiana, on August 2, 1881. Its purpose was to examine the possibilities of establishing a central organization for the various labour bodies operating at the time in the United States. At a second such meeting in Pittsburgh in November, 1881, the new organization was given the name "International Federation of Trades and Labour Unions". The present name, American Federation of Labor, was adopted at the convention of 1886.

The friction which developed between the highly centralized general organization of the Knights of Labour and the autonomous craft bodies of the Federation reached immediately into Canada and became the primary problem of the Trades and Labour Congress which had among its affiliates, elements of both international organizations, that is, mixed assemblies as well as craft unions. For some time the Congress maintained a policy of strict neutrality and even, on occasion, offered to act as peacemaker. The American Federation of Labor soon gained the controlling influence in the United States and in 1902 its ascendancy was felt in Canada. The Trades and Labour Congress then amended its constitution to exclude all assemblies not chartered by the Congress and to provide against the recognition of any national unions where internationals of the same craft existed. Thus the Congress was committed to the policy of working in conjunction with the international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

* The Noble Order of the Knights of Labour was organized in 1869 in Philadelphia and established its first Canadian Assembly in 1881. The Order was designed to unite all work-people and included not only members from trade unions but also the unorganized and unskilled, whose numbers had greatly increased through the widespread use of machinery in many industries. By 1878, "mixed" assemblies, including other groups beside wage-earners were being formed. The Order grew rapidly in the United States until 1885, and in Canada until 1888. It declined, however, in the following years.

Some of the organizations excluded from the Trades and Labour Congress in 1902 immediately formed the National Trades and Labour Congress, which changed its name in 1908 to the Canadian Federation of Labour. Two years later it was joined by the Provincial Workmen's Association, which had been organized in 1879 by the coal miners of Nova Scotia. In June, 1917, the P.W.A. joined forces with the United Mine Workers of Nova Scotia to form the Amalgamated Mine Workers of Nova Scotia which, two years later, was absorbed by the United Mine Workers of America. In 1927, the Canadian Federation of Labour merged with certain independent unions, among them the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees, to form the All-Canadian Congress of Labour. Differences between some members of the executive council resulted in the secession of certain unions which, in 1936, formed another body named the Canadian Federation of Labour.

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, established in 1921, linked together federations and local unions in several industries in the Province of Quebec. Organization of national Catholic unions, in accordance with the Papal Encyclical of 1891 on social problems, began after 1900. The pulp workers at Chicoutimi were the first to organize. It took in all workers in the district and adopted a formal constitution in 1907 as a federation. Gradually, and more rapidly after the war of 1914-18, syndicates, as they are called, were organized in other centres, some covering only one industry and some all industries in the town. As organization spread, federations were formed to cover the local syndicates in certain industries.

In 1935 and thereafter the widening breach in the United States between the American Federation of Labor and the newly-formed Committee for Industrial Organization greatly affected the development of labour organization in Canada. The C.I.O. was formed within the A.F.L. in 1935 to organize the workers in mass-production industries. It was composed of six leading industrial unions affiliated with the A.F.L., and included the officers of two other unions, the Typographers and the Hatters, which had not formally joined the Committee. In 1936 jurisdictional disputes between the Committee and unions of the A.F.L. led the Executive Council of the latter to suspend the C.I.O. unions and to expel them in the following year. The schism was made complete when in November 1938, the C.I.O., including by this time 42 national and international unions, was formally established as a distinct federation and re-named the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada meanwhile tried to keep peace in its ranks and avoid an open break between the A.F.L. and C.I.O. unions in Canada. While it was successful for a time, a schism was inevitable after the formal establishment of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. In January 1939, the Trades and Labour Congress, in accordance with its long-established policy of restricting membership to unions which are not rivals of A.F.L. affiliates or whose jurisdiction does not overlap that of A.F.L. unions, suspended the United Mine Workers of America, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, International Union of Fur Workers, International Union of Quarry Workers, United Automobile Workers, International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, and the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee. These unions were formally expelled by the Trades and Labour Congress at its convention in October 1939.

Meanwhile the All-Canadian Congress of Labour, which had been formed in 1927, continued to function as a federation of national unions until 1940. In that year, it was joined by the Canadian branches of 11 International unions as well as the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee, which in the United States were affiliated with the C.I.O. and which in Canada had been expelled from the Trades and Labour Congress. At a convention in September 1940, its constitution was revised and its name was changed to the Canadian Congress of Labour.

Actions resulting from disagreements between unions and central labour bodies in the United States have not always been followed by similar action on the part of the Canadian branches of these unions or the two Canadian Congresses. For instance, the United Mine Workers of America has maintained its affiliation with the Canadian Congress of Labour despite the fact that the union in the United States withdrew from the Congress of Industrial Organizations in October 1942, was readmitted to the American Federation of Labor in January 1946, and withdrew from that body in December 1947. Similarly, the International Association of Machinists, one of the largest A.F.L. affiliates at the time, seceded from the A.F.L. early in 1943, as a result of jurisdictional disputes. It rejoined later in the same year but was suspended in 1945 after again refusing to pay per capita dues until jurisdictional disagreements were settled. The Canadian branches of this union have remained with the Trades and Labour Congress. Also the International Typographical Union, during the period of its suspension from the A.F.L. from October 1939, to May 1944, remained with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

Several international unions which are affiliated with the A.F.L. in the United States are not affiliated in Canada with the Trades and Labour Congress. Similarly a few unions which are affiliated with the C.I.O. in the United States are not affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour.

The Industrial Workers of the World was formed in the United States in 1905 as the advocate of revolutionary industrial unionism and of the abolition of the wage system. Local branches were later established in Canada which became inactive by 1915. The organization was partially revived in 1922, but has since declined and at present comprises only six local unions.

The One Big Union was formed in March 1919, at a meeting in Calgary of labour representatives from the four western provinces. Local industrial unions of the O.B.U. grew rapidly in the western provinces and in some parts of Ontario, but after 1920 the organization declined and now comprises 40 locals, all in Manitoba. The O.B.U. took part in the formation of the All-Canadian Congress of Labour in 1927, and also participated in the formation of the Canadian Federation of Labour in 1936. At present, it is independent.

The origins of the various Labour Congresses in Canada have been indicated in this section. The larger Congresses now in existence are the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. Several other Congresses of smaller membership also exist in the country. The succeeding sections of this report will show the size and structure of these groups.

II. DISTRIBUTION OF LOCAL UNIONS AND UNION MEMBERSHIP

A. Comparative Statement

The results of the thirty-eighth survey of trade union membership in Canada show that there was a total of 977,594 members at December 31, 1948. This figure represents an increase of 65,470 or 7.2 per cent in membership over the previous year. The figure is also the highest recorded in the history of the Department's survey of union membership. The highest membership recorded previous to World War II, that for the year 1937, was only slightly more than one-third of the present figure. During the war years, 1939-1945, the membership figures increased by 98 per cent and a further increase of 37 per cent has taken place since 1945. Annual membership figures for the years 1911 to 1948 inclusive are shown in Chart I and in Table II.

Close to thirty per cent of the wage and salary workers in non-agricultural industry were trade union members at the end of 1948. The total number in this group was estimated by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to be 3,331,000. On an industry basis* the D.B.S. estimate indicates there are 1,235,000 wage and salary workers in manufacturing industries; 247,000 in construction; 85,000 in mining and quarrying; and 344,000 in transportation and communication. The trade union membership figures indicate that the percentage of the labour force which is unionized in each of these industries is as follows: manufacturing 38; construction 37; mining and quarrying 57; transportation and communication 60. (See Table VI, p. 15).

During 1948, there was a net increase of 158 in the number of union locals which compares with a figure of 321 in 1947. This brought the total number of locals in Canada to 5,114. (See Table V, p. 15 for the number of union locals formed and dissolved, by industry, for the year 1948).

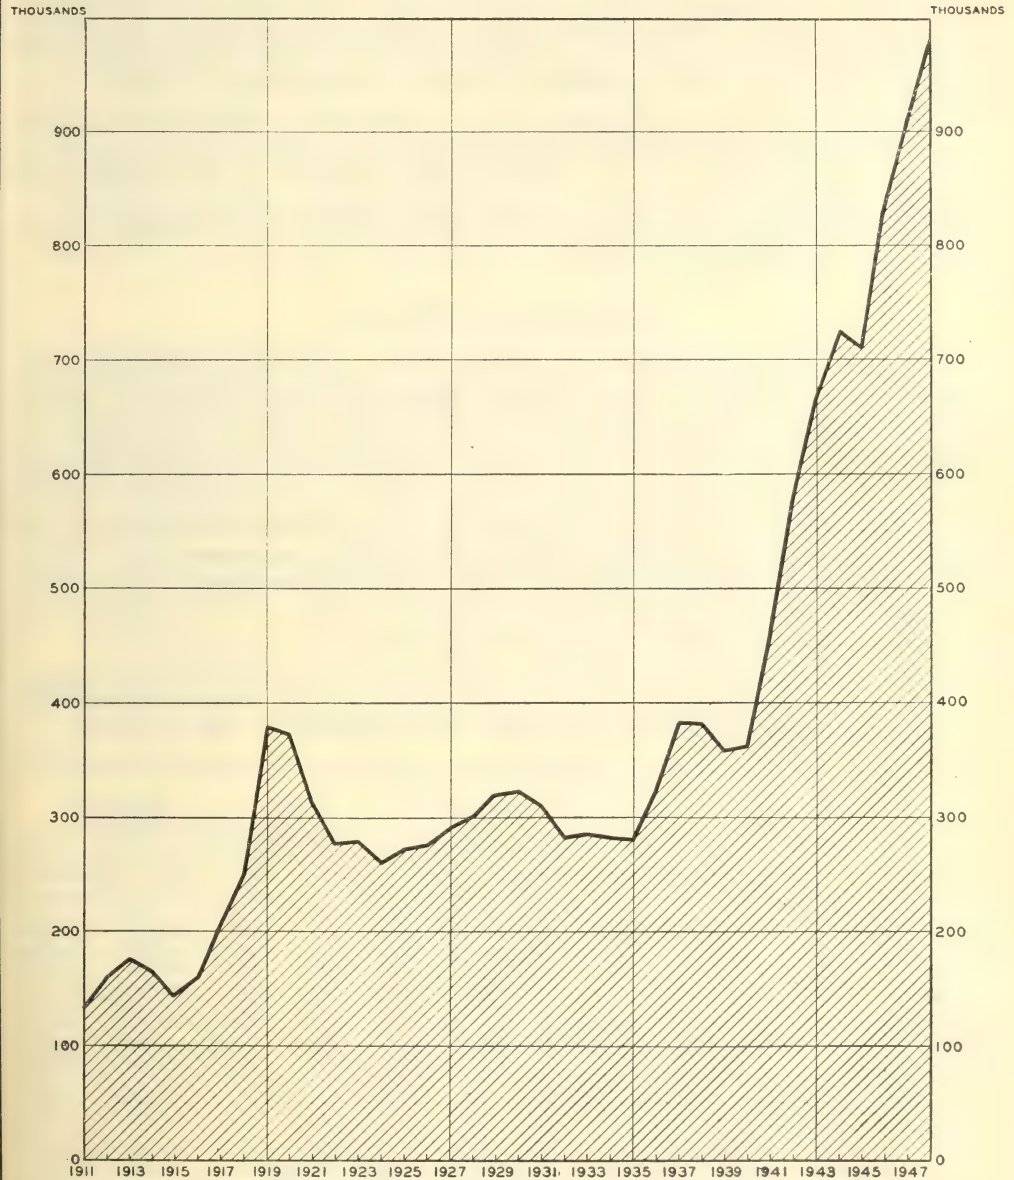

At the level of national and international unions five new unions were organized in 1948. One of these unions, the Woodworkers Industrial Union, was a secessionist group from the International Woodworkers of America (C.C.L.-C.I.O.). The A.F. of L. Roofers' Union entered Canada for the first time since 1937. The remaining new unions were formed from directly chartered unions of the two Congresses. These unions were the International Association of Cleaning and Dye House Workers' Union (A.F.L.); the Oil Workers' International Union (C.C.L.-C.I.O.); and the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union (T.L.C.).

One International union ceased to be active in Canada during 1948. This was the International Glove Workers' Union which formerly had a single local in the Vancouver area. Six unions have been dropped from the list of national unions since 1947. These include the Canadian Fishermen's Union (T.L.C.) from which no report was received this year, and the Canadian Fish Handlers' Union from which no report has been received for two years. The remaining four unions which have been omitted were dissolved in 1947 or 1948.

* From the information supplied the Department, it is not possible to classify membership figures by industrial groups with accuracy, since many unions have members whose employment may fall in more than one industrial classification. The statistics given in this connection should, therefore, be regarded as general indications rather than as exact figures.

TRADE UNION MEMBERSHIP IN CANADA 1911 - 1948

The Canadian Brotherhood of Civic Employees has eight less locals than in 1947. Seven locals transferred to the International Association of Fire-Fighters and one became directly chartered by the C.C.C.L.

The National Council of Canadian Labour reported to the Department for the first time in the 1948 survey. It represents a group of unions which were formerly a part of the Canadian Federation of Labour.

During 1948, there were two temporary suspensions of International unions from the Canadian Congress to which they had been affiliated. The Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees (T.L.C.-A.F.L.) was temporarily suspended from the Trades and Labour Congress. The International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers was suspended from the Canadian Congress of Labour for a short period of time.

The strikes of Canadian Seamen's Union members on the Great Lakes in 1948, and more recently on the Atlantic seaboard, have been accompanied by changes in organization. Three unions have been affected by the changes—the Canadian Seamen's Union, the Canadian Lake Seamen's Union, and the Seafarers' International Union. During 1948, the Canadian Lake Seamen's Union became part of the Seafarers' International Union.

B. Distribution by Provinces

Table III below shows the number of local unions and their reported membership for 1947 and 1948 in each province, reflecting the development of labour organizations in the various regions of Canada. It should be noted that membership figures given in this table are based on reports from local branches. As no accurate estimates can be made of the membership of those locals which have not reported, the membership figures given in this Table are not complete and should be distinguished from the total membership figures reported from the headquarters of the unions which do not report their membership by provinces and localities. As the figures of membership by provinces are not complete they are not exactly comparable from year to year, but they furnish the only available indication of the relative union strength in the various provinces.

Of the 5,114 local branches and local unions known to be in existence at the end of 1948, reports were received from 4,316 or 84 per cent. The membership of the reporting unions totalled 810,916. At the end of 1947, reports received from 85 per cent of 4,956 locals on record in that year, showed a membership of 785,569.

Reports by the International and National unions given in Tables XI and XII on pages 51 to 55 show a total membership of 977,594 for 1948 an increase of 65,470 over 1947. Union membership, as reported by local branches for 1948, increased 25,347 or 3.2 per cent over the corresponding figure for 1947. The largest percentage increases were in Ontario, where membership increased 9.5 per cent to 301,418 during the year, and in Quebec, where it increased 9.1 per cent to 229,458. In British Columbia there was a decrease of 8,562 or 7.4 per cent. Other changes included decreases of 3,042 and 610 in Nova Scotia and Alberta respectively, and increases in New Brunswick of 1,709; in Saskatchewan of 988; and in Manitoba of 103. There was an increase of 201 in the membership reported by locals in Prince Edward Island.

In 1948, as in several preceding years, more than 60 per cent of union membership was concentrated in the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

C. Distribution by Cities

The urban distribution and concentration of union organization and membership are illustrated in Table IV. This Table shows the membership reported by local branches in cities having 2,000 or more members. It should be noted that the figures were compiled from the membership reports received directly from the local unions which may include non-residents of the city where the unions are located. (See page 14).

The 60 urban centres reporting union memberships of 2,000 or more at the end of 1948 showed a combined membership of 622,085. This represented an increase of 3.0 per cent over the membership reported by the same cities for the previous year.

The two leading centres of industry and population, Montreal and Toronto together had 659 or 21.3 per cent of all the locals in the 60 cities listed below and 206,880 or 33.3 per cent of the total membership in these cities.

D. Distribution by Industries

The following section provides an indication of the industrial distribution of trade union membership in Canada. In the statistics which follow in this section each labour organization is included in the industrial category in which the majority of its members are employed. However, it is not possible to classify membership figures by industrial groups with a high degree of accuracy, since the membership of many unions falls into more than one classification.

Ten of the thirteen industrial groups into which labour organizations have been divided for the purposes of this report showed increases in the number of locals at the end of 1948 as compared with the number twelve months earlier (see Table V). The largest increase was in the construction industry where the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners was particularly active.*

The industrial groups recording a decrease in membership were "clothing and footwear", "mining and quarrying" and "other industries" where decreases of 8.2, 0.5 and 5.1 per cent respectively were recorded. The largest increase in membership was that of 20,003 in the construction group, an increase of 27.9 per cent over the corresponding figure for 1947. The membership included in each industrial group is shown in Table VI. (See page 15).

* Many members of this union are engaged in woods and sawmill operations. Information is not available as to the size of this group.

Mining and Quarrying—The largest union in this industrial group was the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers which reported a membership of 25,000 at the end of 1948. Included in this figure is an unknown number of members engaged in smelting and refining operations. The United Mine Workers of America reported a Canadian membership of 21,832, but of this number 3,400 members are in "District 50" which includes workers in various non-mining occupations; their membership as included in this group is therefore 18,432 with the other 3,400 being included in the "All Other Industries" classification. Most of the asbestos miners in the Province of Quebec are organized in the National Federation of Mining Industry Employees.

* It is not possible to classify membership figures by industrial groups with a high degree of accuracy, since many unions have members whose employment may fall in more than one classification.

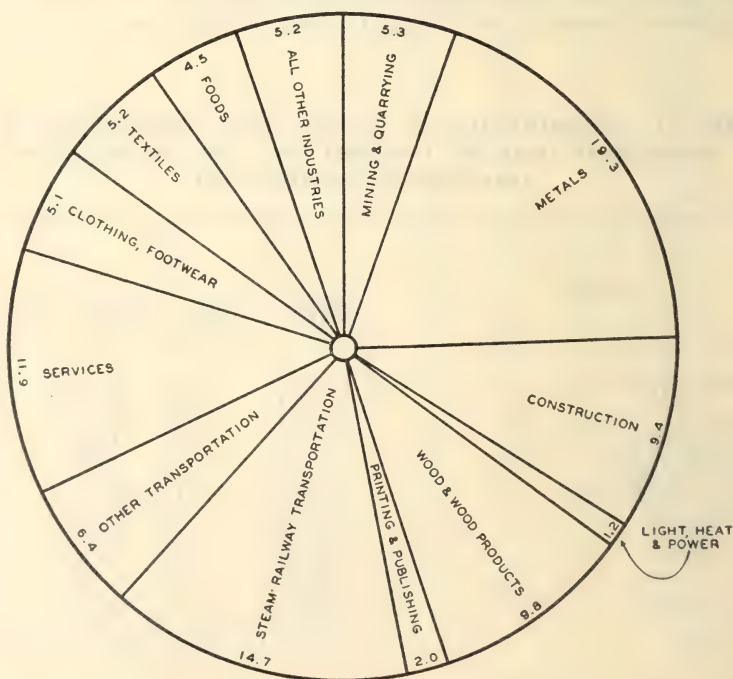

Metals—Slightly less than one-fifth of Canadian trade union membership is concentrated in this group in which are included members in metal working establishments, elevator constructors, bridge, structural and ornamental iron workers, workers engaged in railway shops, shipyards, machine, implement, airplane and automobile factories. The International Union United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America and the United Steelworkers of America with reported memberships of 53,000 and 48,000 respectively, are the two largest unions in Canada. These, together with the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America and the International Association of Machinists, which rank seventh and eighth respectively, constituted over 75 per cent of the total membership in the metal industries.

Other unions with a large number of members in the metals group are the International Moulders and Foundry Workers' Union of North America, the National Metals Trades Federation, the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders and Helpers of America, the Maritime Marine Workers' Federation, the Shipyard General Workers' Federation of British Columbia, the Sheet Metal Workers' International Association and the International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Drop Forgers and Helpers.

Construction—The unions in this group are mostly "craft" organizations of which the main body of members is engaged chiefly or solely on building or construction projects, but which also includes carpenters in woodworking establishments and electrical workers in railway shops. The largest union in this group is the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, with the third largest membership of any union in Canada.* Other large unions in the "construction" group are the National Federation of Building Trades and Construction Materials, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, the Amalgamated Building and Construction Workers of Canada, the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers of America, the Bricklayers, Masons and Plasterers' International Union of America, the International Hod Carriers, Building and Common Labourers' Union of America and the Canadian Union of Building Trades Workers of the Province of Quebec.

Light, Heat and Power—This category includes operating and stationary engineers, firemen and oilers and workers engaged in the production of light, heat and power. The largest unions in the group are the International Union of Operating Engineers, the National Union of Operating Engineers and the National Organization of Civic, Utility and Electrical Workers.

Wood and Wood Products—This classification includes workers engaged in logging, lumber and saw mills, the manufacture of furniture and of pulp and paper. The largest union in this group is the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers which reported a membership of 25,700 at the end of 1948. Other large unions are the International Woodworkers of America, the Woodworkers' Industrial Union of Canada, the National Catholic Federation of Wood Industry Workers of Canada, the National Federation of Pulp and Paper Workers, the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, the Upholsterers' International Union of North America and The National Federation of Furniture Workers.

Printing and Publishing—This group is comprised of printers, pressmen, engravers, lithographers, stereotypers, die stampers, siderographers and bookbinders. The International Typographical Union with 5,400 members is the largest union in this group. Other large unions are the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, the Federation of Printing Trades of Canada, the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders and the Amalgamated Lithographers of America.

Steam Railway Transportation—The largest single union in this industry is the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers with 32,300 members at the end of 1948. It consists mainly of clerks, freight handlers, station employees, shop labourers and dining and sleeping-car employees of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National Express Company. It also has some members in car shops, among steamship clerks and freight handlers and in motor transport. It has the fourth largest membership of any union in Canada and the largest membership of the purely Canadian unions.

The Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees composed of 21,076 sectionmen and mechanics in the bridge and building departments is the second largest union in the steam railway industry. In this industry are the four large independent International unions: the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Order of Railway Conductors of America. Together these four brotherhoods had a membership of 41,126 at the end of 1948.

Among other large unions in this group are: the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, which includes car-repairing and car-building trades such as millwrights, carpenters and upholsterers; the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees which covers clerks, freight handlers and station workers, most of whom are employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway; The Order of Railroad Telegraphers and the International Brotherhood of Firemen and Oilers.

The Canadian Association of Railwaymen and the National Union of Railwaymen are purely Canadian, semi-industrial unions; at the end of 1948 these unions reported memberships of 3,372 and 3,053 respectively.

The Brotherhood of Railway Carmen together with certain local branches of the machinists', blacksmiths', boilermakers', electrical workers', moulders', plumbers' and sheet metal workers' unions, which have most of their members in railway shops, constitute Division No. 4 of the Railway Department of the American Federation of Labor, a body representing these classes of employees in negotiations with the Canadian railway companies.

Other Transportation—The Amalgamated Association of Street, Electric Railway and Motor Coach Employees of America with 14,146 members at the end of 1948 is the largest union in this group. Craftsmen such as electrical workers and machinists usually belong to unions of their respective crafts, although, by arrangements with their unions they may belong to the street railway organization.

The next largest organizations in this category in 1948 were the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, the International Longshoremen's Association, the National Maritime Federation of Canada, the Brotherhood of Express Employees, the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, the Seafarers' International Union of North America, the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and the National Association of Marine Engineers of Canada.

Services—Unions in this category include those composed of employees in public service, in personal service and in the recreational field.

Of 31 National, International and local unions with total memberships of 116,169 which are classified in this group, 16 with a total membership of 46,829 are unions of public employees (federal, provincial or municipal). A large but undeterminable part of 26,940 members of directly chartered or independent locals which are included in this category are also engaged in public service. Of the 16 unions mentioned above only four with combined memberships of 6,105 are International; the other 12 with 40,724 members are National unions. The largest unions of public servants are the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, the Canadian Postal Employees' Association, the British Columbia Provincial Government Employees' Association, the National Federation of Municipal Employees, the British Columbia Teachers' Federation, the Federated Association of Letter Carriers, The Saskatchewan Civil Service Association, and the Alberta Civil Service Association. The only International union of public employees with a large number of members in Canada is the International Association of Fire-Fighters which had 6,000 Canadian members at the end of 1948.

The largest union in the service group is the American Federation of Musicians of the United States and Canada which reported a Canadian membership of 8,985. The Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders' International Union reported a membership of 8,942. Other large unions in the service group are the National Catholic Federation of Hospital Services and Religious Institutions, and the Building Service Employees' International Union.

In the recreational field the two largest unions are the American Federation of Musicians (mentioned above) and the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada.

Clothing and Footwear—The International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union in cloak, suit and dressmaking establishments together with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America in the men's custom and factory-made clothing industry constitute over 40 per cent of the total membership in this group. The main local centres of these unions in Canada are at Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. Other important unions in this group are the International Fur and Leather Workers' Union of the United States and Canada, the National Federation of Leather and Shoe Workers of Canada, the National Federation of Clothing Industry Workers, the National Federation of Full Fashioned and Circular Hosiery Workers, the National Union of Shoe and Leather Workers, the United Hatters, Cap and Millinery Workers' International Union, the United Garment Workers of America and the National Federation of Glove Workers.

Textiles—Three unions constitute more than 95 per cent of the membership in this category. These are: (1) the United Textile Workers of America (T.L.C.-A.F.L.) with 20,785 members; (2) the Textile Workers' Union of America (C.C.L.-C.I.O.) with 15,000 members; and, (3) the National Catholic Federation of Textile Workers (C.C.C.L.) with 12,217 members.

Foods—The largest union in this industrial group is the United Packinghouse Workers of America which reported 17,000 members at the end of 1948. Other unions included in this group are the Distillery, Rectifying and Wine Workers' International Union of America, the Federation of Fruit and Vegetable Workers' Unions, the Bakery and Confectionery Workers' International Union of America, and the International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal, Soft Drink and Distillery Workers of America.

All Other Industries—This group consists of all industries and trades which do not fall into any of the foregoing classifications. It includes the following unions: the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, the International Chemical Workers' Union, District 50 of the United Mine Workers of America, the Tobacco Workers' International Union, the Commercial Telegraphers' Union and the Retail Clerks' International Association. Almost 25 per cent of union members in this group belong to directly chartered and independent locals.

E. Women in Trade Unions

Local unions are requested in the annual survey of the Department to report the number of their members who are women. Many locals have been unable to provide this information since they did not differentiate on the basis of sex in their membership records. As a result, the statistics of female membership given below probably understate the case.

Of the 4,316 locals which reported their 1948 membership figures only 1,360 or 31 per cent reported as to their female membership; these numbered 89,331 or 11 per cent of the total membership of the reporting locals. In 1947, there were 86,603 female members reported by 1,267 locals. This shows an increase of 3.2 per cent in the number of females reported in 1948 over the figure for 1947.

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour listed 15,107 of the female members reported. They belonged to 167 locals of the Confederation.

The urban centres for which female membership of 1,000 or over was reported in 1948 were as follows: Montreal (18,702); Toronto (12,095); Vancouver (5,426);

At Toronto, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America (9 locals) listed 1,058 female members and at Windsor, the International Union United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (1 local) had 1,218 female members.

III. STRUCTURE AND MEMBERSHIP OF LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS IN CANADA

The historical origins of the principal central labour organizations have been outlined briefly in Section I. Their present size, structure and composition are discussed in the following pages. Information is given concerning the membership, the finances and the names and addresses of the officers. Membership figures are obtained from three sources: (1) the report for the fiscal year submitted to the annual convention of the organization, (2) the returns for the end of the year made to the Department of Labour by each of the Congresses and the trade unions, and (3) the reports submitted by the local branches.

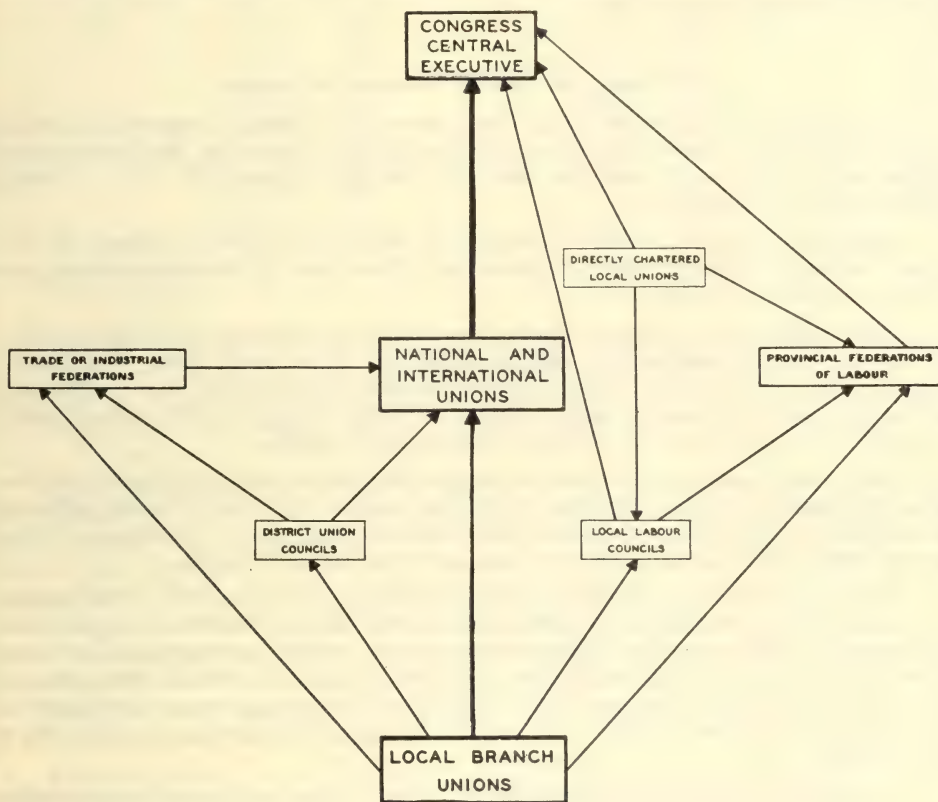

A. Union Structure

The two largest Canadian labour Congresses, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour, are composed of affiliated National and International unions, and their local union branches and directly chartered local or federal unions. The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour is similarly organized, except that it has no international affiliates and confines its activities almost entirely to the Province of Quebec.

These central labour organizations include also, in varying degrees, subsidiary delegate bodies, namely, local labour councils, provincial federations, district union councils and federations of unions in allied trades or industries. Chart 3 illustrates the inter-relationships of the constituent bodies in the leading labour Congresses.

STRUCTURE OF LEADING LABOUR CONGRESSES IN CANADA

Local union branches form the foundation of any labour organization which is more extensive in scope than the independent local union. They are chartered by their national or international unions, and they elect delegates to the conventions of these larger organizations, their parent bodies. The latter, in turn are represented at the annual convention of the central labour federations or congress with which they are affiliated, usually in proportion to the per capita dues which they pay to the central headquarters. The executive members of the central organization are usually drawn from the leading officials of these affiliated unions. National and international unions may operate also through intermediate or subordinate bodies; a union may group its local branches into several "district councils" for administrative or organizational purposes; and the numerous local branches and district councils of national or international unions in allied trades or industries may be drawn together into "federations".

Local unions directly chartered by a central congress and local union branches are also drawn together and represented in local labour councils. These bodies are designed to represent the common interests of all affiliated unions of all trades and industries in cities and towns in which they are established. Local labour councils, as well as their constituent local organizations, are represented in provincial federations or councils. The latter, together with national and international unions, local labour councils and directly chartered local or federal unions, send delegates to the annual conventions of the central labour organization with which they are affiliated. The union federations in allied trades (trade or industrial federations) and district union councils do not have direct representation in the central congresses.

(1) Trades and Labour Congress of Canada

At the end of December 1948, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada consisted of 15 National unions comprising 422 local branches, 66 International unions with 2,083 local branches and 274 (49 A.F.L. and 225 T.L.C.) federal or directly chartered locals.

Affiliated delegate bodies on record at the end of 1948 included 56 local labour councils, and 4 provincial federations. There were 80 district union councils of unions affiliated with the T.L.C.

The Department requests the headquarters of National and International unions to submit membership figures as at the end of each year. This source, together with figures submitted by the Congress in regard to its directly chartered unions provides the basis of figures shown in Table X on page 28, a membership of 439,029 for the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

The second source of information regarding trade union membership is from reports submitted to the Department by local union branches. Of the 2,779 locals of all kinds affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada at December 31, 1948, 2,421 locals reported a total membership of 405,449.

The Treasurer's report for the eleven months ending June 30, 1948, showed that there were 3,002 affiliated local unions of all kinds in existence at that date, an increase of 474 over the 2,528 reported twelve months previously. The report showed total receipts from all sources of $179,274.83 and total disbursements of $151,012.11, leaving a balance of $28,262.72 which after allowance for depreciation and accounts receivable written off, brought the surplus account up to $157,720.66.

The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada takes as its aim the promotion of "legislation in the interests of organized labour in the Dominion of Canada, and to assist in safeguarding the social and economic standards of the workers".† The Congress establishes city or district central councils to promote the development of local branch unions and Provincial Federations or Executive Committees to assist in influencing public opinion and the course of labour legislation in the Dominion and in the Provinces. Also the Congress encourages international trade unionism in Canada and the sale of union labelled goods. Any body of workers in Canada which is not eligible for membership in recognized international or national unions may be chartered by the Congress. It is compulsory for such directly chartered locals to affiliate with the local trades and labour council where such exists, although for branches of national or international unions membership is voluntary. Central delegate bodies do not participate in the formulation of wage contracts or the adjustment of wage disputes or working rules.

† Preamble to the constitution T.L.C.

The Congress is the Canadian counterpart of the American Federation of Labor in so far as both are organized primarily along craft lines and both have many international unions in common affiliation. However, these organizations are by no means identical. Although most international unions in Canada which are affiliated with the A.F.L. in the U.S.A. are affiliated as regards the Canadian membership with the T.L.C., this is not invariably the case. The Congress is an autonomous organization with its own constitutional provisions for the admission and expulsion of member unions. Organizations with jurisdictions conflicting with that of international or national unions already affiliated with the Congress are barred from membership; affiliation with the A.F.L. is not a necessary condition of admittance to the Congress.

Although the general policies of the A.F.L. and T.L.C. may be similar, they are formed independently; occasionally, the policies and practices of the two organizations may be in conflict. An example may be found in the steps taken toward the formation of a world labour congress to replace the International Federation of Trade Unions; while the A.F.L. were opposed, the T.L.C. encouraged the plan and sent delegates to the London conferences.

The officers of the Trades and Labour Congress, elected by the Convention of Oct. 11-16, 1948††, at Victoria, B.C. are as follows:

(2) Canadian Congress of Labour

The Canadian Congress of Labour had in affiliation 10 National unions with 333 local branches, 18 International unions with 684 local branches and 170 directly chartered local unions as at December 31, 1948.

Affiliated delegate bodies on record at the end of 1948, included 33 local labour councils, 6 provincial federations, and 34 district union councils.

According to reports from the Congress and the headquarters of affiliated National and International unions, the membership was 338,627 in the 1,187 locals or branches at the end of 1948 (Table X, page 28).

Of the 1,187 locals of all kinds affiliated with the Congress, 956 reported to the Department of Labour a total of 254,112 members at December 31, 1948.

At the eighth convention of the Canadian Congress of Labour, held in October 1948, the total membership was reported to be approximately 375,000. The membership figures reported at previous conventions were for 1947, 360,000; for 1946, 350,000; for 1944, 250,000; for 1943, 200,000; for 1942, 160,000; for 1941, 125,000. (No convention was held in 1945.)

Receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, were reported by the Secretary-Treasurer to be $322,091.13 and expenditures $309,892.43 leaving a surplus for the fiscal year of $12,198.70 which brought the surplus account at the end of the fiscal year to $70,488.94.

The relationship between the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organizations is similar to that between the Trades and Labour Congress and the American Federation of Labor, as stated in the previous section. While both the C.C.L. and the C.I.O. are committed to industrial rather than craft unionization and follow similar policies and philosophies, they are by no means identical organizations. Most, but not all, of the C.I.O. unions with locals in Canada are affiliated with the C.C.L. The Canadian Congress is an autonomous national centre, its policies formulated by the delegates representing the Canadian membership. By means of Organizing Committees, special funds and other assistance, the Congress campaigns "to organize the unorganized" wherever possible, on behalf of established industrial unions, in order to achieve its constitutionally-expressed purpose "to promote the interest of its affiliates and generally to advance the economic and social welfare of the workers". Towards these ends, the Congress is conscious of the efforts necessary in the political field "to promote the enactment of suitable legislative measures as well as of its responsibilities in regard to the improvement of industrial relations and the protection of the economic interests of workers through collective bargaining".

The officers of the Canadian Congress of Labour elected at the Convention held Oct. 11-15, 1948, at Toronto, were as follows:

President, A. R. Mosher, C.B.E. (Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers), 230 Laurier Ave. W., Ottawa, Ont.

First Vice-President, A. McAuslane (United Steelworkers of America), 230 Laurier Ave. W., Ottawa, Ont.

Third Vice-President, C. H. Millard (United Steelworkers of America), 11½ Spadina Road, Toronto, Ont.

Secretary-Treasurer, P. Conroy, M.B.E. (United Mine Workers of America), 230 Laurier Ave. W., Ottawa, Ont.

Executive Committee:

F. W. Dowling (United Packinghouse Workers of America), 11½ Spadina Road, Toronto, Ont.

S. Barrett (United Mine Workers of America), 137 Bond St., Toronto, Ont.

T. Prezeau (National Union of Operating Engineers of Canada), 1282 Sherbrooke St. E., Montreal, P.Q.

The Executive-Secretary of the Canadian Congress of Labour is N. S. Dowd, 230 Laurier Ave. W., Ottawa, Ont.

(3) Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour links together 16 federations each made up of local unions in the same industry, in addition to a number of local unions not connected with any of the federations but directly chartered by the Confederation.

According to the reports received by the Department of Labour from the Confederation and its component federations there were 428 local branches or "syndicates", of which 96 were directly chartered, in existence at the end of 1948, with a membership of 93,370 (Table X, page 28).

At its twenty-seventh annual convention in September, 1948, the Confederation reported a total of 376 local branches having an aggregate membership of 82,218 at May 31, 1948. These figures represented increases of 31 locals and 12,042 members for the fiscal year.

Of the 428 locals in existence at the end of 1948, 353 submitted reports with memberships totalling 82,781.

At the end of 1948, the number of delegate bodies affiliated with the Confederation included 7 district union councils, and 15 local labour councils.

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour is an advocate of exclusively national industrial unionism and stands "opposed to control by American unions".* This attitude toward international unionism is more predominant in the Province of Quebec, in which membership of the Confederation is mostly confined.

B. Union Membership and Affiliation

(1) Local Unions Directly Chartered

Local or "federal" unions in Canada chartered directly by the leading labour federations, and having no direct connection with National and International unions, numbered 551 in 1948, as compared with 544 in the previous year.

The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada had 225 directly chartered local unions with a total membership of 29,688 at the end of 1948, as compared with 210 locals and 31,913 members for 1947. The Canadian Congress of Labour had 170 locals with a membership of 21,904 at the end of 1948, as compared with 184 locals and 20,959 members the previous year. The 49 directly chartered unions of the American Federation of Labor, which are also affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, had 6,383 members at the end of 1948, a decrease of 7 locals and 592 members from the figures of the previous year. The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour had 96 locals or syndicates which were not affiliated with any of its constituent federations and their estimated total membership at the end of 1948, was 9,120 as compared with 92 branches and 12,800 members twelve months earlier.

The location of these unions in 1948, is shown in the list below. The name of the central organization is followed by the name and address of the president

Where possible this information has been revised up to the date of publication of this report. In the case of the American Federation of Labor, the names and addresses of the organizers in Canada are also given.

(2) Local Union Branches

Most local unions in Canada are branches of international trade unions, the majority of which are affiliated in the United States with the American Federation of Labor or the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Practically all Canadian locals which are branches of unions affiliated with the A.F.L. in the United States are affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and almost all of those which are branches of international unions affiliated with the C.I.O. in the United States are affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour. Some of the international unions are independent in the United States, having no affiliation with either the C.I.O. or the A.F.L.; of these unions some are affiliated with one of the Canadian Congresses. Each of the Congresses in Canada has also a number of purely Canadian trade union affiliates. Most of these are regional or national in scope, having branches or locals in various localities. Many also, as described in the previous section, are purely local unions which are chartered directly by a Congress. In addition, some local unions affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress have received their charters directly from the American Federation of Labor in Washington, D.C. Local unions of this latter type may be "federal" unions which cover a variety of workers in different industries and trades, or they may be more homogeneous unions which later join others in the same trade or industry to become branches of national or international trade unions. There are no local unions in Canada directly chartered by the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

⁽¹⁾ These comprise international unions affiliated with the A.F.L. in the United States, the Canadian branches of which are not affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada or the Canadian Congress of Labour. The 49 local or federal unions with 6,383 members which received their charters directly from the A.F.L. have been included under the Trades and Labour Congress in this table as they are affiliated with that body.

⁽²⁾ These comprise international unions affiliated with the C.I.O. in the United States, the Canadian branches of which are not affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour.

Four unions of railway workers—the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Order of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen—are international organizations which have not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor or the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States, and their branches in Canada likewise have not affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress or the Canadian Congress of Labour. The Canadian branches of these international unions are composed of a network of local branches or “lodges”, which in turn are drawn together in various local, regional and national councils and committees.

In addition to those locals which have connections with the two large Canadian labour federations mentioned above, some are branches of national unions affiliated to the smaller federations which are nationalistic in outlook and opposed to international trade unionism. The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour is made up of industrial unions or “federations”, the basic units of which are “syndicates”, and also of a few directly affiliated “syndicates” or local unions which later join others in the same industry in the Province of Quebec to become branches of a federation.

In addition to the 376 branches or “lodges” of the independent international railway brotherhoods, there were 222 locals of unaffiliated national and international unions in Canada at the end of 1948. There were also 39 local unions scattered throughout Canada which had no connections with labour organizations of greater than local proportions.

Table X summarizes the distribution of all Canadian local unions and their membership classified in the various groups described above.

(3) National and International Unions

(a) Number and Location of Branches

Trade unions of larger than local proportions are listed in alphabetical order below and their affiliation (if any). Officers and number and locations of branches are also shown. In the case of international unions the names and addresses of the international presidents, secretaries, and of the Canadian officials are given, and in the case of each purely Canadian union, the name of the president and secretary. Unions formed in 1948, and those establishing locals in Canada in 1948 for the first time, are printed in ordinary type, and others in italics. Where a union is affiliated with a central labour federation the latter is identified by a symbol, as shown in the key at the beginning of the list.

In the list below there are 109 international and 54 national and regional unions which had Canadian members at the end of 1948. Of the international unions, 65 were affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and as regards their members in Canada, with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; 12 organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States were unaffiliated with any of the Central labour bodies in Canada; 17 were affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and as regards their Canadian members, with the Canadian Congress of Labour, while five organizations affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States were unaffiliated in Canada. One organization which was unaffiliated in the United States was affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress in Canada and one organization which is also unaffiliated in the United States is affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour. Eight of the international unions operating in Canada were without central body affiliation either in Canada or elsewhere. Of the national or regional organizations, 15 were affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress, 10 with the Canadian Congress of Labour, 16 with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, and one with the Canadian Federation of Labour; twelve national unions are not affiliated with any of the central labour organizations.

(b) Membership and Number of Branches

The number of branches and the membership of national and international trade unions listed in the previous section are compiled in Tables XI and XII below. Table XI lists international unions with branches in Canada, and shows the membership and number of branches in Canada and in the United States. Table XII provides similar information for national unions. Membership figures in these tables have been obtained from reports for directly chartered locals submitted to the Department of Labour as at the end of 1948, from the central labour congresses, and from reports on membership which trade unions submit to the Department of Labour as at the end of the year.

The largest labour organizations, as reported to the Department, are unions of metal trade workers, construction workers, railway employees, wood and wood products' workers, and miners. The International Union United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (C.C.L.-C.I.O.) with 53,000 members, has the largest membership reported by any union in Canada. It is followed in order of size by: the United Steelworkers of America (C.C.L.-C.I.O.) with 48,000 members, the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (T.L.C.-A.F.L.) with 36,381 members, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers (C.C.L.) with 32,300 members, International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers (T.L.C.-A.F.L.) with 25,700, the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers (C.C.L.-C.I.O.) with 25,000 members, the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (C.C.L.-C.I.O.) with 25,000 members, the International Association of Machinists (T.L.C.) with 24,871 members, the International Woodworkers of America (C.C.L.-C.I.O.) with 24,425 members, the United Mine Workers of America (C.C.L.) with 21,832 members, and the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees with 21,076 members.

The number of local unions having 1,000 or more members decreased from 123 in 1947, to 111 in 1948. In 1943 there were 108 locals with memberships of 1,000 or over, but in 1944 the number of such locals declined to 97 with a further decrease to 78 in 1945. However, in 1946 it increased to 87, and in 1947 there were 123 such locals. The decreases in the number of large branches in 1944 and 1945, reflect the diminution of the production of war materials in large plants after 1943, and the increases in 1946 and 1947, indicate that many of these plants have been reconverted to the manufacture of peace-time products on a large scale. In 1943, there were three locals with over 12,000 members, whereas in 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947 and 1948, the largest memberships reported by any local union were 8,905, 8,115, 9,577, 9,533 and 9,950 respectively. At the end of 1948, there were four locals with over 5,000 members, one less than in 1947; in 1944, there had been seven such locals, in 1945 four, and five in 1946.

(on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence) work closely together through a National Council. Both organizations are also represented in the Marine Council (formed in 1944) which includes seamen, marine engineers and telegraphers.

C. Delegate Organizations*

The number, size and membership of unions composing the central labour federations in Canada have been outlined above. Member unions are also drawn together in other delegate bodies described below. These include local labour councils, provincial federations of labour, district union councils, and federations of unions in allied trades or industries.

(1) Local Labour Councils

Each local labour council is composed of representatives from chartered local or federal unions and local branches of national and international unions organized in the community. Unlike district councils it is not compulsory for local unions to join local trades and labour councils. The latter have no authority to issue charters to local trades and labour councils which affiliate, to order or terminate strikes, or to participate in the adjustment of wage disputes or working rules. Local labour councils are the means for bringing co-operation among, and promoting the common interests of, local unions organized in different industries and trades. They serve as the spokesmen of organized labour in municipal affairs. These councils are represented in the provincial federations and at the conventions of the central congresses.

There were 106 local labour councils in 76 cities and towns and local communities throughout Canada in 1948. Seven councils were formed in 1948 and one was disbanded, making a net increase of six in the number of councils.

These bodies are variously described as "trades and labour councils," "labour councils," and "central labour councils," depending to some extent on their affiliation. The above names in the order given apply respectively to the 56 councils of unions affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, 33 with the Canadian Congress of Labour, 15 with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour and one with the One Big Union. One council was not affiliated with any central body.

* Chart 3 on page 21 shows graphically how delegate organizations are related to other labour bodies.

The following list presents for each province all such councils known to the Department of Labour, and indicates their affiliation, the names and addresses of their officers, the number of unions represented in each, and their total membership. Italics indicate that the council was organized in 1948.

(2) Provincial Federations

The member organizations of provincial federations of labour include local labour councils, local branches of national and international unions, and directly chartered or federal labour unions. These affiliates pay a per capita tax for the expenses of the provincial body, and are represented by delegates at its conventions. Also, the provincial organization sends delegates to the central congress.

The provincial federations are designed to afford an opportunity for co-operation and collective action on matters of common concern to affiliated unions and councils in each province. They give special attention to provincial legislation, and their executive officers make representations to provincial governments.

Of the ten federations functioning in 1948, four were chartered by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; these were in Alberta, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec. The remaining six federations, which were in Alberta, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Saskatchewan, were affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour.

The Industrial Federation of Labour of Alberta was formed during 1948. This fact is indicated by italics in the list given below.

Alberta Federation of Labour (T.L.C.).—Pres., Harry Boyse, 401-19th St. N., Lethbridge. Sec., Herbert G. Turner, Labour Temple, 10006-104th St., Edmonton. Unions, 103; members, 13,360.

The provincial executive committees of the Trades and Labour Congress have functions similar to those of the provincial federations. Members of these committees are elected by delegates from their respective provinces attending the convention of the Congress while officers of provincial federations are elected at conventions of their own organizations. Provincial executive committees of the T.L.C. exist in Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. For a list of members of these committees see page 24.

(3) District Union Councils

Unlike the federations or local labour councils, the delegate bodies known as "district union councils," "joint boards" or "conference boards" are composed of representatives of local branches of only one union, rather than of several unions in allied trades or industries. The operations of such councils are financially supported by a per capita tax paid by the affiliated local branches which are correspondingly entitled to representation by a certain number of elected delegates to the district union councils. The latter, however, are not directly represented at the central congresses.

The jurisdiction of these district councils varies. In some cases it is confined to a locality where two or more local branches of the same organization exist; in other instances it includes all local branch unions in a given trade within a stated area, and occasionally it extends to a whole province or even covers the same class of workers throughout the Dominion.

Most district councils or conference boards belong to certain unions, each of which is restricted to one or a few trades. Consequently, they usually exert a greater degree of control over their local union affiliates than do federations. They are designed to bring greater unity of action to local unions and to establish greater uniformity in wages, hours, and working conditions among workers in various plants and localities. Some councils direct the organizing work of their international unions in the areas under their jurisdiction, and in many cases the councils furnish the bargaining agents for the negotiation of collective agreements. In addition, most district councils have legislative and executive powers on all matters relating to the common interests of the locals under their jurisdiction, including the ordering and terminating of strikes, subject to the sanction of the general executive of the national or international union with which they are affiliated. Many also have the power to levy special assessments on member locals.

There were 122 district union councils in Canada in 1948, of which 80 were affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, 34 with the Canadian Congress of Labour, seven with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour and one which was unaffiliated.

The councils were divided among the various trades and industries as follows: 20 in the building trades of which 15 were affiliated with the T.L.C. and five with the C.C.C.L.; 15 in the metal trades of which 11 were affiliated with the T.L.C. and four with the C.C.L.; 16 in textiles and clothing of which 5 were affiliated with the T.L.C. and 11 with the C.C.L.; two in railway transportation both affiliated with the C.C.L.; 8 in other transportation, seven of which were affiliated with the T.L.C. and one with the C.C.L.; four in mining all of which were affiliated with the C.C.L.; 33 in services, 31 of which were affiliated with the T.L.C. and two with the C.C.L.; four of operating engineers and firemen all affiliated with the T.L.C.; 20 in miscellaneous industries of which 7 were affiliated with the T.L.C.; 10 with the C.C.L.; two with the C.C.C.L. and one which was not affiliated.

The list below gives the affiliations, names and addresses of officers, number of member unions, and total membership of each district council or conference board. Those of which the names are printed in italics were formed during 1948.

(4) Union Federations in Allied Trades

Union federations, usually called trades councils, bring together local branches of more than one union in allied trades and are different from district union councils in which the member locals are exclusively local branches of a single trade union. The "union federation" is designed primarily for craft, rather than for industrial unions, as a medium for the achievement of unified collective bargaining, of greater uniformity in wages, hours, and working conditions for similar work in different localities and plants; it is likewise a medium for the prevention and settlement of jurisdictional disputes among unions and for the promotion of common organizational aims. These organizations are financed by per capita dues from their member unions, each of which has representation in the federated body. Their jurisdiction is usually confined to particular regions or localities, although Division No. 4, Railway Employees' Department of the American Federation of Labor has Dominion-wide jurisdiction, as have also C.N.R. System Federation No. 11, and C.P.R. System Federation No. 125, which are affiliated with it. Union federations in allied trades are not directly represented in the central congresses.

The list given below contains 63 such organizations which were understood to be in existence at the close of 1948. Reports were not received from all these union federations, but in the absence of direct evidence of their dissolution, the names and locations of organizations previously listed have been retained; the names of officers have not been included in cases where no report was received.

Of the 63 organizations listed, 17 were in the building trades, two in metal trades, 21 in printing and paper-making, one in textiles and clothing, 16 in steam railway transportation, one in other transportation and five in services.

Union federations are not usually chartered by the Canadian central labour bodies, but most of these federations are made up of locals of unions which are affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress.

All the building trades councils listed below are affiliates of the Building and Construction Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor and subject only to the rules of that Department. They have full autonomy in matters affecting organized workmen employed in the building and construction industry in their respective localities.

There are two metal trades councils. One of these is affiliated with the Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor and the other is affiliated with the One Big Union.

Printing trades federations or councils are provided for in an agreement establishing the International Allied Printing Trades Association in 1911. This agreement includes the five international unions of bookbinders, printing pressmen and assistants, stereotypers and electrotypers, photo-engravers, and typographers, all of which participated in the formation of the Association. Some councils also make provision for the inclusion of union lithographers.

The Quebec and Eastern Canada Council of Paper Mill Unions consists of two sections, one composed of local branches of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers and the other of locals of the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers; a number of local branches in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario also belong to this council, which is a voluntary organization. The Ottawa-Hull-Gatineau District Council of Paper Mill Unions is similarly constituted. The Ontario and Manitoba Council of Pulp and Paper Mill Unions (formerly the Northern Ontario District Council of Paper Mill Unions), includes in addition local branches of electrical workers, machinists, operating engineers and office workers employed in the pulp and paper industry. The Niagara District Council of American Federation of Labor Unions, includes electrical workers and longshoremen as well as paper makers in the Thorold-Merritton area. These bodies are designed to bring greater uniformity of wages and working conditions in their respective paper making areas and to represent the member crafts as a collective bargaining agency in the industry.

The Winnipeg Needle Trades Council is composed of representatives from local branches of international unions of ladies' garment workers, hat, cap and millinery workers, fur workers and glove workers.

In the railway employees' group, Division No. 4, chartered by the Railway Employees' Department of the American Federation of Labor, is the largest and most important federated body. It has jurisdiction over the organized shop mechanics on all Canadian railway lines, including machinists, boilermakers, blacksmiths, carmen, electrical workers, sheet metal workers, and the like. Local branch unions of these workers are brought together in a system federation covering the particular railway line on which they are employed. Delegates from these system federations and crafts make up the representation at conventions of the division.

Federations of public employees are often more diversified in composition than those in other industries. Their membership includes not only regular civic employees, but also the employees of street railway and telephone services where these are publicly owned.

The four main functions of union federations in allied trades or industries may be briefly stated as follows:—

- (1) The adjustment of jurisdictional and trade disputes;
- (2) uniform collective bargaining for all member unions in the trade or industry; uniformity of working hours and shop rules;
- (3) the study and influence of legislation affecting the trade or industry;
- (4) education; technical training for apprentices and improving the skill of craftsmen.

The list below includes the names of all federations known to the Department of Labour, and in the cases where these have been available, the names and addresses of their officers, the number of affiliated unions and the total membership. Where there are regional or smaller federations affiliated with a national federation, the name of the latter is given first, with its affiliates indented below it. Those printed in italics were formed during 1948.

D. Committees of Railroad Brotherhoods

The trade unions of railway workers, usually referred to as the railroad brotherhoods, have developed an elaborate organization of delegate bodies or councils to promote and protect the interests of their members. Each local branch or "lodge" of a union has a "grievance" or "adjustment" committee or a "protective board" for each railway line represented in the lodge, provided there are five or more members employed on the line. The chairmen of these local committees constitute "joint protective boards" or "general grievance committees" for each railway system. Grievances which cannot be disposed of locally are taken up by these committees with the management of the railway. The committees act also as negotiating committees in bargaining for collective agreements.

Legislative boards have been established by the four international railway brotherhoods of engineers, firemen and enginemen, conductors, and railroad trainmen to further the interests of the railway workers by petitioning for and watching the course of legislation in the Parliament of Canada or in the legislature of any province. A joint legislative committee representing these four unions, together with the maintenance of way employees and the telegraphers, provides for joint action in the Dominion field. There are similar joint committees, including the same or other brotherhoods, in the provinces.

The various committees of the railroad brotherhoods, with the names and addresses of their officers, are listed below. The names of the railroads in connection with which the committees have jurisdiction are arranged in alphabetical order. Those which appear in this list for the first time are shown in italics.

IV. TRADE UNION BENEFITS

Many trade unions provide their members with various benefits which are paid from the general funds of the union or financed by a special fund to which the members contribute. Such cash payments include strike benefits to members on a union-approved strike, death benefits to cover a deceased member's funeral and doctors' bills, sick and accident benefits, old age pensions, and unemployment benefits. (The last item includes the cost of travelling in search of work.) Many unions also have insurance departments through which members may obtain life and accident insurance.

The figures given below deal only with the benefits paid to Canadian members by unions which have reported on this subject to the Department. They should be regarded as an indication of the magnitude of the "mutual aid" activities of some unions rather than as a complete summary of trade union benefits.

Of the 109 international unions with Canadian branches, 47 with a total membership of 302,630, reported the amount of benefits paid on behalf of Canadian members only. The total amounts reported for each type of benefit were:

Death.....	$1,013,533
Strike.....	426,137
Old age.....	714,490
Sick and accident.....	421,243
Unemployment.....
Other benefits.....	140,867
Total.....	$2,716,270

Sixteen national unions with a combined membership of 100,687, reported the following paid benefits:

Death.....	$ 45,423
Strike.....	45,876
Old age.....
Sick and accident.....	20,654
Unemployment.....
Other benefits.....	2,952
Total.....	$ 114,905

V. THE LABOUR PRESS

With the growth of the trade union movement, organized labour has developed a press of considerable size and importance. Official union journals keep the members informed on the activities and aims of their respective unions as well as those of the labour movement generally.

The majority of these publications have a regular subscription rate for non-members, but to insure that a copy reaches each member, unions usually arrange to include the subscription in the per capita tax which members are required to pay.

The editing and management of union journals are in most cases under the charge of the general secretary. As the international unions with branches in Canada have their headquarters in the United States, their publishing offices are also there. In some cases, special editions are published for Canadian members.

The number of official journals known to have been published in Canada during 1948 by labour organizations, other than local unions, was 53. Of these seven were published by labour centres, 27 by organizations listed as national unions including nine published by organizations of public employees, and 19 by delegate bodies. In addition there were at least 12 periodicals published by organizations of teachers and government employees which are not listed as labour organizations.

Some union locals issue regular publications dealing with their activities, while others issue them only when there are membership campaigns, strikes, or other events which they feel should be brought to the attention of their members as of the community. While some of these publications are received by the Library of the Department of Labour, no complete list is available.

In the list of publications which follows, the name of the union is given in each case, its affiliation, the name of the publication, followed by the address. The frequency of publication is shown, and if printed in any language other than English, this is also indicated.

Labour Centres

Each of the Canadian Labour centres had at least one official publication in 1948. Two journals, one in English and one in French, were published by the Canadian Congress of Labour. In the French-language journal of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, a page was devoted to English, and the Trades and Labour Congress Journal contained a section in French.

VI. ASSOCIATIONS OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

Associations of teachers and certain other classes of public employees, including those on the payrolls of the Dominion, Provincial and municipal governments, are outlined briefly below. Several of the organizations are full-fledged trade-unions; others are more in the nature of mutual benefit associations or advisory councils. Two associations of Dominion Government employees, one of persons employed by the Province of Manitoba, one of persons employed by the Province of Alberta, one of persons employed by the Province of Saskatchewan, the British Columbia Teachers' Federation and several organizations of municipal employees are affiliated with either the T.L.C. or C.C.L.

A. Teachers' Associations

The British Columbia Teachers' Federation became affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada in January, 1944, marking the first time that a teachers' organization in Canada had joined forces with a recognized trade union central body. The provincial teachers' federations, shown in the following list, are linked together in the Canadian Teachers' Federation which was founded in 1919. The Federation, which reported a membership of 58,000 at the end of 1948, has existed since 1927, as a federation of the teachers' associations in nine provinces, including since 1945, the Federation of English speaking Catholic Teachers in Quebec.

C. Organizations of Municipal Employees

The largest single organization of municipal employees in Canada is the International Association of Fire-Fighters (T.L.C.-A.F.L.). As shown earlier in this report this union has 85 local branches in Canada and a total membership of 6,000 persons. This union was expanded in 1948, by the addition of seven locals formerly part of the Canadian Brotherhood of Civic Employees.

At the end of 1948 the Trades and Labour Congress had 104 directly chartered local unions of civic employees with a total membership of 15,740 persons. The Canadian Congress of Labour had 22 such locals with a membership of 4,589.

INTRODUCTION

The membership of trade unions increased by approximately three percent during the year 1949. Unions classified as international, together with independent unions registered substantial membership advances, but these were in part offset by decreases in national unions. Important events in the field of labour organization centered on matters of congress affiliation and the extension of both national unions and international unions to include members in the newest province, Newfoundland. This report provides a survey of labour organization as it existed on December 31, 1949 in the ten provinces of Canada.

(a) Annual Survey of Labour Organization

At the close of each calendar year a survey of labour organization in Canada is conducted by the Department of Labour. The results are made public in the Annual Report on Labour Organization in Canada. The following report, the thirty-ninth in the series, contains the results of the survey conducted as at December 31, 1949, and, in addition an outline of the organizational structure of the labour movement in this country.

The statistical information in this report was compiled from information submitted to the Department of Labour by the unions. Two questionnaires were used for this purpose. The first of these was completed by the national and international offices of the union, and it is from this report that the national membership figures were taken.

The second questionnaire is directed to local union branches throughout the country. Reports from this source provide the basis for a statistical series showing the industrial, geographical and sex distribution of trade union membership in Canada. The coverage from this source is, however, incomplete and consequently the results must be regarded as forming a separate statistical series from the national figures. All figures are as of December 31 of the year under discussion.

From the information on both sets of replies a list is made up of the unions active in Canada, of the location of local branches and of the union officials.

(b) Labour Organization, 1949

At the close of 1949 the number of trade union members in Canada reached an all-time high of 1,005,639. Geographically, more than half of this number was in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Industrially, manufacturing industries have the greatest number of union members with transportation and services next in order. The number of female workers has increased over the 1948 level and in locals reporting female membership (27 per cent or 1433) over twenty per cent were female (93,474).

The compilation of figures from reports of local branches in 1949 represents almost ninety per cent of the total membership since 87 per cent of the existing locals reported, and 3 unions with a membership of 13,983 having no locals but members "at large" were included with reporting locals.

1. THE GROWTH OF LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA, 1900-1950*

(Reprinted from Labour Gazette, September, 1950, Historical Chart appears on p. 16)

The half century which has passed since the setting up of the Federal Department of Labour has been marked by a significant growth in the participation of Canadian workers in labour organizations. In 1900, union membership was relatively small, but already a basis, from which future unionization was to grow, had been laid. The unions of the time drew their membership almost entirely from skilled craftsmen and coal miners. Today, the structure of labour organization is more complex due both to internal and external factors. On the one side the basis of union organization has broadened to include all classes of workers and the membership has grown both in absolute numbers and in terms of its proportion in the labour force. On the other side there have been important changes in the organization of industry and in the nature of the work performed.

Consequently, it is fitting at this mid-century mark to trace, in broad terms at least, the historical pattern of events which gave rise to the present structure of labour unions. This can be done perhaps best by setting forth first of all the essential characteristics of labour organization, both as it was around the turn of the century, and as it is now. Against this background the significance of intervening events will be more readily seen.

Labour Organization Before 1900

When the Federal Department of Labour was established organizations of workers had already been active in Canada for at least seventy-five years. Earliest efforts towards union activity in Canada were undoubtedly attributable in large measure to emigrant craftsmen from Great Britain. The newness of the country, the prevalence of domestic activity in many areas of industry, and the scattered nature of the population, all reduced the effectiveness of the efforts of the craftsmen. But small local groupings of workers, so-called Labour-circles, were in existence in Lower Canada before 1830.

The lead toward a more permanent trade union movement in Canada, just as in France, Italy, Germany and the United States, was to come from printers. As early as 1827, a group of printers in Quebec City took part in the regulation of wages, cared for its sick and provided certain entertainment.¹ In Toronto, then York, a similar organization dates from 1834. Coopers, stonemasons and shoemakers were not far behind in beginning their activities. Until the middle of the nineteenth century, however, the groupings of labourers were purely local in membership and outlook. But as the number of these groups increased it became clear that a more permanent and informed leadership was needed than could be provided from within their own ranks. Much of the required aid was forthcoming from unions in the United States.

* For an extended discussion of this subject, see H. A. Logan, Trade Unions in Canada.

Led by unions, primarily of United States origin, and by skilled workers with union experience, primarily from Great Britain, groups of workers in various industries organized local unions after 1850. Among these were the moulders, the shoemakers, the sailmakers, the shipwrights and the caulkers. The first of these groups to affiliate formally with a union in the United States was the moulders, which joined the Iron Moulders Union of America, in 1859. A more significant affiliation of the time, however, appears to have been that of Canadian printers with the National Typographical Union, or the International Typographical Union as it was re-named later. The first printers to affiliate with this union were in St. John; they became a local of the I.T.U. in 1865. A Toronto local was chartered in 1869, and other locals were founded in various localities, including Ottawa, shortly afterwards. At a later date activities of these I.T.U. locals, particularly in Toronto and Ottawa, gave the original impetus to an overall labour movement in this country.

Two other ways in which the labour movement in the United States influenced its Canadian counterpart were evident at this time. First, around 1860 the four railway brotherhoods², already well established in the United States, began to take Canadians into their membership. Second, the Knights of St. Crispin spread to this country. This group was made up of shoemakers and had as its objective limiting the use of machines in the manufacture of shoes. Its membership grew rapidly and locals were active throughout Eastern Canada during the early 1870's.

Although the Canadian unions of this time borrowed their organization in large measure from the United States, Canadian labour law was originally based on that in the United Kingdom. Canadian law, however, did not keep exact pace with changes in British law. Whereas the English Parliament passed an act in 1871 exempting trade unions from the law respecting restraint of trade, no such revision was made immediately in Canada. The importance of this omission became evident in 1872, when, in July of that year, the printers of Toronto struck in favour of a nine-hour day. Soon after the strike began a group of the union leaders were jailed on a charge of criminal conspiracy. Agitation for changes in the legislation of the country followed and, before the printers could be tried, laws, almost identical with the British counterpart, were passed—the Trade Unions Act and the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1872. Jointly they freed trade unions from liability under the common law on conspiracy in restraint of trade.

Removal of legislative barriers to the organization and activities of trade unions, together with the short period of unprecedented prosperity in Canadian industry at about the same time, provided a stimulus for a further expansion and consolidation of unions. Encouraged by these circumstances, the first attempts were made by the unions to set up an overall trade union body in Canada. This took the form of the Canadian Labour Union which conducted annual conventions for the trade union movement of Canada during the four years 1873 through to 1877.

The Canadian Labour Union proved to be only a gesture toward centralization of the labour movement. Born of the optimism arising out of a period of prosperity, it disintegrated during the stringencies of the subsequent period of depression. Even as the congress was formed the prosperous conditions of the time gave way to uncertainty and depression. Union members were indefinite in their activities and, even though there were at least seventy unions in the Province of Ontario alone, there was little common action after 1877. Nevertheless, the organization, during its short life, was able to influence labour legislation for the time and brought together representatives of unions, primarily from Ontario.

² Engineers, firemen, conductors and trainmen.

Trade unions were not sufficiently vigorous to establish a central body again until 1883. In the intervening period, unions had not been overly active, although organizational efforts by international unions in Canada had become more effective and the Knights of Labour had entered the country for the first time. The latter group which originated in the United States was made up of local assemblies which took in workers from most industries and crafts. In 1883, twenty-one unions gathered together to form a labour congress. They met again in 1886 and since that time the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada has been in continuous existence.

The lead in establishing the overall organization on this occasion, as in the case of the earlier Canadian Labour Union, appears to have come from the Toronto Trades Assembly. This move also had the strong support of the locals of the International Typographical Union in Toronto and in Ottawa.

The fortunes of the Trades and Labour Congress through the remaining years of the nineteenth century varied with the level of economic conditions in the country. The period of the 1890's was particularly trying for the young Congress, the lowest ebb in organization being reached in 1895. At the turn of the century, however, the Congress had been firmly established primarily by craft unions and by assemblies of the Knights of Labour.

Two other organizations were present in Canada before 1900. These affected miners on the East and on the West coasts. In Nova Scotia, the Provincial Workmen's Association had as its members a majority of the coal miners; and in British Columbia, District number six of the Western Federation of Miners organized metal miners. This latter group, a section of a radical union of the same name in the United States, did not obtain a large membership prior to 1900.

The Provincial Workmen's Association, originally formed as a result of a strike at Springhill, Nova Scotia, in the spring of 1879, included a large number of Nova Scotian coal miners. For a time the Association was able to influence the passage of labour legislation in the Province, which improved materially working conditions in the mines. At the turn of the century, however, the P.W.A. was rapidly losing ground owing to the activities of the Knights of Labour. The Association was to regain prominence after 1900 on the basis of a wider membership than could be obtained among the coal miners.

Labour Organization, 1900

By 1900, therefore, a foundation of trade unionism in Canada had been laid. Precise data as to the extent of unionism at the time are not now available, but its broad characteristics are clear. Firstly, at least fifteen thousand trade union members were active in Canada. Over eight thousand of these belonged to unions affiliated with the single central labour body of the time, the Trades and Labour Congress. The remainder were members of the Provincial Workmen's Association, the Western Federation of Miners, or independent unions, the latter including the four independent railroad brotherhoods.

The majority of union members were craft workers in the Province of Ontario. Over half the known locals of the time were located in Ontario as was a large proportion of the membership. Thus in total, at 1900, only a small proportion of the labour force, mostly skilled workers in central Canada, was involved in labour unions.

Labour Organization, 1950

The characteristics of the group of one million workers who are now organized in Canada are shown in the results of the annual survey of trade union membership³. When compared with the available information on the entire labour force, these data reveal the distribution of organized labour. Such comparisons are available on the basis of size, and of both geographical and industrial areas.

Almost one-third of non-agricultural wage-earners are union members. The existing membership is scattered unevenly through the various geographical divisions of the country. Viewed provincially, the distribution of union members, as would be expected, favours the more highly industrialized provinces, more than half the number (55 per cent) being found in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Only one in every ten Canadian trade unionists is located in the less industrialized maritime provinces. The remainder of the membership is divided almost evenly among the three prairie provinces and British Columbia.

Nevertheless, approximately the same proportion of the labour force is organized in each of the provinces excepting British Columbia. In the latter province, slightly less than forty per cent of the non-agricultural paid labour force is organized, as compared with less than thirty per cent in the other provinces.

Within the provinces, the great majority of union members are to be found in urban communities having populations of 30,000 or more. Each of these communities contains 2,000 or more union members; together, they account for three-quarters of the membership in Canada. Moreover, as may be expected, the greatest concentration of membership is to be found in the metropolitan centres of the country. The Toronto and Montreal areas together contain 20 per cent of the union members and nine other main industrial centres include a further 20 per cent.

On the basis of industrial classifications, the most highly organized appears to be the transportation industries where close to two-thirds of the workers are involved. In each of the remaining industrial groups, with the exception of services and trade, it is estimated that approximately one-third of the labour force is unionized. Less than one-sixth of the workers in the service group belong to unions.

So far as can be determined less than ten per cent of the union members in Canada today belong to unions which are not affiliated to one of the central labour congresses, of which there are now several as compared with the single congress existing in 1900. The great majority, approximately 85 per cent, are associated with the two largest congresses—the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, which comprises most of the craft unions, and the Canadian Congress of Labour which comprises industrial unions. Another ten per cent are members of unions affiliated with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. The numerical strength of each of the central labour bodies and of the independent unions for 1949 is listed below.

Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, 459,068.

American Federation of Labor, 13,996.

Canadian Congress of Labour, 301,729.

Congress of Industrial Organizations, 27,475.

Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, 80,089.

International Railway Brotherhoods (independent), 41,363.

Canadian Federation of Labour, 3,872.

National Council of Canadian Labour, 3,451.

Unaffiliated National and International Unions, 57,923.

Unaffiliated Local Unions, 16,673.

Whereas unions at the turn of the century had only limited experience in the structure and functions of central labour bodies and delegate organizations generally, the unions of today maintain a complex system of delegate bodies. Subordinate delegate bodies have been formed within the central congresses themselves to advance the cause of member unions at the local and provincial levels. Various named and formed, these organizations concentrate on legislative and community activities. Intra-union bodies of delegates from locals in the same geographical locality are common as are inter-union bodies of unions in related trades. The activities of these latter groups are more intimately connected with the economic activities of the unions.

The Development of the Canadian Labour Congresses Since 1900

Many forces have moulded the present pattern of labour union organization in Canada. Aside from the leadership provided within the unions themselves, one of the dominant influences has been the changes in the nature and character of the labour force⁴. Besides this the changing character of industrial production, including technological advances and large-scale operations, has raised new problems for both unions and management. The special problems posed during the war years and by the depression of the thirties have also had their influence on the nature of labour organization. Changes in the attitudes of management towards employment problems, including the establishment of personnel and industrial relations departments, and towards the role of labour-production committees have played their part.

The effects of developments in social thinking and in labour legislation both in Canada and elsewhere are hard to measure but these too have all been part of the total environment in which the present labour union organization has evolved.

The actual changes which have occurred during the past fifty years in labour union organization in Canada can be discussed conveniently in relation to the growth of each of the three labour congresses, namely: the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour.

The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada

The Trades and Labour Congress is the only continuing central organization among Canadian trade unions dating back to 1900. Its success during the half century, as measured by membership figures, has varied. The conditions of the economy have at times been unfavourable to unions; on three occasions large membership groups have been lost to the Congress through decisions respecting union jurisdiction; and the experience of the twenties presented particular difficulties for the unions in the Congress.

In 1900, there were two major groups within the T.L.C.—the locals of international craft unions and the assemblies of the Knights of Labour. Locals of both these types of organizations were more strongly organized than their earlier counterparts, more continuity of leadership being provided for them than at any time during the nineteenth century. The T.L.C. was proving to be of importance in this respect, especially in obtaining legislative action. The activity of organizers from the headquarters in the United States of the International unions, and of the American Federation of Labor, was a major factor in organizational work. This duality of leadership, in itself, gave rise to the first of the major divisions in the Canadian labour movement.

The Knights of Labour and the national unions which had been established were competing for membership with the international unions in some areas. Consequently, after much debate, the Knights and other unions competing with the A.F.L. unions were expelled from the Congress by the 1902 convention,⁵ and the T.L.C. became a central organization principally of the international craft unions in Canada.⁶ Since that time these have been the largest section in the Congress, comprising usually about 85 per cent of the membership.

⁴ See "The Canadian Labour Force", Labour Gazette, January, 1950, pp. 19-28.

It should be interjected at this point that national unions have formed the second and smaller continuing group within the Congress. The size of national unions of the T.L.C. has fluctuated between 13,000 in 1913 and more than 50,000 in 1948. The unions in the group have also varied, but mostly it has been made up of unions of purely national character such as letter carriers and maritime organizations. The third group in the T.L.C., now numbering about 30,000, has been the federal unions and the directly chartered locals. These small unions have no affiliation with any of the larger unions. They have been organized in fields where other organization is lacking or where mixed craft groups have been encountered.

To return to the historical development, during the early years of the century the energies of the Congress were devoted chiefly to securing legislative reform. Provincial federations or executives were set up to aid in this respect. The Congress also advocated changes in federal legislation respecting, among other things, industrial disputes and fair wages on government contract work.

A second break within the ranks of organized labour in Canada came in 1919 and gave rise to the One Big Union. Two issues were at the basis of this division. First, the dissenting group objected to the emphasis on craft organization within the Congress to the virtual exclusion of industrial organization. Second, the members advocated a greater emphasis on direct industrial action in preference to legislative presentations. The membership of the One Big Union included metal miners in British Columbia, coal miners in Alberta and many industrial workers in Ontario and Manitoba.

In spite of the loss of membership to the One Big Union, the membership of the T.L.C. reached a peak in 1921 which it was not to reach again until 1943. The advance in membership, however, came within the organization already established rather than through the establishment of any new unions of major importance. The decreases which followed through the 1920's took place within the same framework.

Through the 1920's the membership of unions affiliated with the Congress fell off each year without exception until 1929. This is the one period in the history of Canadian unions when the membership did not rise with the prosperity of the country. In fact, it was not until the depression period of the thirties that the membership of the T.L.C., and of the union movement as a whole, again began to pick up to any marked extent.

Increases in the membership of the T.L.C. unions after 1935 reflected a broadening of the basis of union membership. Not only did the craft unions take in a greater variety of the workers in the craft covered, but new groups of industrial workers became members of unions for the first time. Workers in the automotive and steel industries were prominent in the latter group.⁷

At this time unions for workers in the railway shop trades, the building trades, the printing trades, and certain of the machine trades formed the major portion of the Congress. As time passed, however, new groups of workers have been added as they were formed within the labour force. Others were dropped as their groups became less well defined. Moreover, it may be said that craft unions now extend beyond strictly craft lines to include many workers associated with the craft, but who are in semi-skilled or unskilled jobs.

⁶ The experience of the T.L.C. at this time was in accord with experience in the United States. The American Federation of Labor, established in 1881, was functioning as the central body for the craft unions in the United States and, after it had turned the Knights of Labour from its organization, was insisting on no dual unionism within its ranks.

The manner in which industrial workers were to be accommodated in older craft unions first became a matter for dispute in the American Federation of Labor. After a series of disputes, a Committee for Industrial Organization was formed within the A.F.L. to organize workers in mass production industries. It included the six leading industrial unions of the A.F.L.—the United Mine Workers of America, the International Ladies' Garment Workers, the Oil Field, Gas Well and Refinery Workers and the United Textile Workers. Officers of the United Hatters, Cap and Millinery Workers and the International Typographical Union were also active in the Committee although their unions did not join. In 1936, a year after this Committee was formed, its unions were suspended from the A.F.L. on the grounds that they were fostering dual unions. Thereupon a new central organization was set up by the unions affected. At this time it was composed of unions in such industries as flat glass, automobile, rubber and steel.

In Canada, the T.L.C. attempted to avoid a division in its ranks such as had taken place in the A.F.L. and did this successfully until 1938. In that year the C.I.O. unions, now definitely expelled from the A.F.L., formed the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and the executive of the T.L.C. felt it could no longer ignore the dual character of the unionism advocated by those unions. Consequently, they were expelled from the T.L.C. For the T.L.C. expulsion of the C.I.O. unions meant a loss of over 20,000 members, but it also meant a return to a more strict division of jurisdiction among member unions.

In the years that have followed this third split in the ranks of the T.L.C. the organization has increased greatly in membership. The organizational structure had been established in time to gain from the increase in employment during the war and post-war periods when many workers became members of affiliated unions. The established unions took into their membership a large portion of the workers added to sections of the labour force in which the unions were active. Major membership increases were recorded in unions having within their jurisdiction such groups as railway employees, machinists, carpenters and plumbers. Together the unions in the T.L.C. more than doubled their membership in the period 1939-1946. Today, the membership is close to three times the pre-war level.

The Canadian Congress of Labour

The Canadian Congress of Labour is the second largest of the labour congresses in Canada. It dates from 1940 when the C.I.O. unions, then recently expelled from the T.L.C., joined with the All-Canadian Congress of Labour to form a single congress. Although the history of the C.C.L. is short, and the C.I.O. unions in it are relatively new, the history of the section stemming from the A.C.C.L. actually dates back to 1902.

The origins of the A.C.C.L. can be traced to an early break in the T.L.C. Expulsion in 1902 of the Knights of Labour, and of other unions considered to be in competition with international unions, left the expelled unions without a central body, and to fill this need the National Trades and Labour Congress was formed. In 1908, its name was changed to the Canadian Federation of Labour.

For twenty-five years the C.F.L. existed as such within the Canadian labour movement. Its principal aim, as stated, was to advance the cause of national as opposed to international unionism. The assemblies of the Knights of Labour were dissolved early in the life of the organization, and thereafter the membership appears to have been mainly in the provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia.

The Nova Scotian membership consisted of the Provincial Workmen's Association which was affiliated in 1910. This body, however, became dissatisfied with the affiliation and eventually became identified with the United Mine Workers of America. In the meantime, the Federation secured a following in Ontario, principally among the printers and bookbinders, but about the same time the Quebec membership was almost entirely lost to the organization.

After 1919 the C.F.L. experienced a short period of expansion. The affiliation of workers from the building trades, of engineers and of electrical workers, all in Ontario and in the provinces to the west, brought the total membership to over 17,000 in 1923. But despite the enthusiasm for expansion, the gains were soon lost and the Federation looked elsewhere for support. In 1927, as a solution to its problem, the Federation merged with the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and certain other independent unions to form the All-Canadian Congress of Labour.

The C.B.R.E. had been active for some years prior to this amalgamation. It was founded in 1908 at Moncton and grew to be the largest national union in the country. It functioned as an affiliate of the T.L.C. from 1917 to 1921, but was expelled because of conflicting jurisdiction with the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks (T.L.C.-A.F.L.). The C.B.R.E. found the majority of its membership in the government-owned railroads and took in most classes of workers on these lines. Its association with the C.F.L. in establishing the A.C.C.L. was a step toward a wider organization of Canadian workers.

The A.C.C.L. made an earnest effort through the thirteen years of its existence (1927-40) to organize large groups of industrial workers who had not been eligible for membership in older unions. These efforts were limited by lack of funds and at times unfavourable economic conditions. The activities of the Congress were also hampered by a conflict in objectives among the various member unions. This was but one of the tensions which led to a division of the Congress in 1936 when a group of unions withdrew to form a new Canadian Federation of Labour.

The unions remaining in the A.C.C.L., recognizing the opportunity for more adequate organization, joined with the C.I.O. unions in 1940 to form the Canadian Congress of Labour. These unions, largely industrial in nature, included workers in such industries as mining and the manufacture of automobiles, iron and steel and clothing. During the past decade they have expanded rapidly to their present position. This expansion has brought into unions, for the first time in many cases, large groups of workers from the mass production industries. The national unions which transferred from the A.C.C.L. bulked large in the membership as it was first formed. Already experienced in the activities of a central labour body in this country, these unions gave leadership to their younger associates. At the present time the international unions have a larger membership than the national unions in the Congress. Their expansion has been swift, having as a pattern of development the establishment in the United States of international organizing committees and later replacement by international unions.

The C.C.L. has been active in advocating legislative reform and of later years has formed political action committees. Since 1946 the Canadian Congress of Labour has passed resolutions identifying it with the policy and objectives of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. This is in contrast to the policies of both the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour which have remained without political affiliation.

Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour

The remaining congress of importance in the Canadian labour movement is the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. The C.C.C.L. links together 16 federations of workers and many local unions, principally in the Province of Quebec. The federations cover barbers, longshoremen, municipal employees, and workers in building, clothing, furniture, gloves, leather and shoes, printing, asbestos, pulp and paper, textiles and commercial establishments.

In 1900 there was a lockout of boot and shoe workers in Quebec City. The employers, 22 in number, had recently organized an association and, following a strike in one factory, the others were closed down in an attempt to force the workmen to abandon their unions. The employers' proposals included a declaration by each workman that he did not belong to any union and that he agree to a board of arbitration made up of a committee of the manufacturers' association. The employees refused these terms but expressed willingness to have the matter arbitrated by a joint body. In the end, Archbishop Begin of Quebec was asked to arbitrate. His award, following the instructions in the Pope's Encyclical of 1891 dealing with social problems, declared the right of employees to form associations for legitimate ends, but expressed dissatisfaction with the constitutions of three of the six unions. The rules in question were changed, a permanent board of arbitration was set up and the unions consented to have a chaplain appointed to advise them.

The Papal Encyclical sums up the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church toward the rights of labour. The chief points of interest are the declaration for freedom of association, for collective agreements to determine working conditions, the duty of the state to prevent abuses in labour matters and to enact legislation to promote social justice. But, in the Church's view, economic improvement is inseparable from moral improvement and for this reason the Church must give guidance and provide chaplains for the unions.

Not until 1912, however, was a purely Catholic union set up. The first of these was among pulp workers at Chicoutimi. During the war the number of unions, syndicats as they are called, increased. In some cases, the higher dues of the internationals appear to have been a factor in determining allegiance. Usually, the clergy took some part in preparing the ground for union organization. A daily paper was started in Quebec, L'Action Catholique, the object being "to implant Catholic unionism among the workers of the city and district of Quebec". Study circles were organized to give the workers an understanding of the Catholic doctrine in relation to labour.

In 1918, a Central Trades and Labour Council was formed in Quebec with 27 syndicats affiliated with it. In the same year a secretariat was set up in Quebec City for the Catholic syndicats of the district which was to publish a weekly paper, give lectures on political and social problems, aid in organizing unions and co-operative societies and give free legal advice and medical service. Delegates from 27 local Catholic unions met in Quebec City in 1918, and in 1919 at Three Rivers there were 123 delegates representing 31,000 union members. At a third meeting of 225 delegates in 1920 at Chicoutimi definite arrangements were made to form a Confederation of Catholic Workers of Canada. A constitution was adopted the following year and a chaplain appointed with the right to take part in all meetings but without the right to vote.

The National Catholic Unions are, in the main, organizations on trade or craft lines but, in some cases, they are organized by industry as among the asbestos and clothing workers. The Confederal Bureau appoints organizers and administers the fund voted by the Confederation for organizing work.

The Confederation has advocated provision for conciliation and arbitration machinery in all collective agreements with employers. It has taken a notable part in securing legislation, not only in petitioning for changes in the law but in drafting bills to be presented to the government or directly through private members to the legislature.

In addition to these three major federations of labour unions there are several unions grouped into relatively small central labour bodies and a number of local independent unions.

Labour unions play an important role in Canada today. They are made up of workers drawn from almost every industry and geographical area of the country. As such, the history and aims of Canadian Labour organizations are important data not only for an understanding of our economy but also of other aspects of our national life.

II. DISTRIBUTION OF LOCAL UNIONS AND UNION MEMBERSHIP

A. Comparative Statement

Results of the thirty-ninth annual survey of trade union membership in Canada indicate that there were 1,005,639 members in 5,268 locals at December 31, 1949, an increase of 28,045, or 2.9 per cent, over 1948. Table II shows the membership figures for the years 1911 to 1949 inclusive, that for 1949 being the highest recorded. Prior to World War II the highest membership was in the year 1937, but it was only slightly more than one-third the 1949 total. During the war years, 1939-1945, the membership figures increased by 98 per cent and a further increase of forty per cent has taken place since 1945. Close to thirty per cent of the estimated 3,454,000 wage and salary workers in non-agricultural industry were trade union members at the end of 1949. The net increase in the number of union locals during 1949 was 154.

*Including the province of Newfoundland for the first time.

Several events of importance to labour organization in Canada took place during 1949. Firstly, confederation of Newfoundland with Canada brought several new unions into this country as well as many new members of international unions. Secondly, expulsion of unions from the major congresses has brought about shifts in affiliations of large groups of workers. Thirdly, the formation of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions took place during the year.

On its entry into Canada, Newfoundland added over one hundred thousand workers to the labour force and about a quarter of this number to the body of trade unionists. Prior to this, unions in Newfoundland were for the most part independent, although a number were affiliated with the Newfoundland Federation of Labour. The latter organization also contained locals of international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and has now become a provincial federation of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. In addition, several of the local unions have become locals of international craft unions bringing some to the area for the first time. The United Steelworkers of America (C.I.O.-C.C.L.) has established locals on the island.

Growth of Trade Union Membership in Canada, 1911-49

Three unions were expelled from the two largest labour congresses during 1949. These were the Canadian Seamen's Union, expelled from the T.L.C., and the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers and the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, both expelled from the C.C.L.

Expulsion of the Canadian Seamen's Union from the T.L.C. represented the climax of a lengthy period of labour troubles in the shipping industry. Events in 1949 which gave immediate effect to the expulsion grew out of a jurisdictional dispute between the C.S.U. and the Seafarers International Union on the East Coast. This dispute prompted the C.S.U. to take strike action although the executive of the T.L.C. had formally advised against it, as did many other unions. Suspension of the C.S.U. from the T.L.C. followed a series of unsuccessful efforts by the T.L.C. executive to settle the strike and in September the general convention of the congress passed an expulsion order.

Following these events, 700 West Coast seamen ended their membership with the C.S.U., formed a union known as the West Coast Seamen's Union (Canada) and signed contracts with 18 freighters. At the same time, the Fish Handlers Union locals of the C.S.U. in Halifax, Lunenburg, North Sydney and Glace Bay voted to end their affiliation with the C.S.U. and to seek affiliation with the T.L.C. as a national union.

During 1949, a dispute arose between the C.C.L. and the United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of America which resulted in the suspension of the latter from the Congress. The dispute originated between the U.E.W. and the Ontario Federation of Labour, both of which were affiliated with the C.C.L. The Federation charged that the "UE News" had published "slandorous" statements against it. Subsequently, the dispute was carried to the executive council of the C.C.L., which suspended the U.E.W. officers from its meetings.

Differences also occurred during the year between the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the U.E.W. in the United States, which resulted in the expulsion of the latter from the American Congress. Thereupon, the C.I.O. sponsored the organization of a new electrical workers union to be known as the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers. Its activities were also extended to Canada.

Early in November the C.C.L. suspended the U.E.W. for non-payment of dues and invited the new union of electrical workers to affiliate. The year closed with both unions vying for membership among Canadian electrical workers. While these were the immediate reasons for the expulsion of the U.E.W. from the C.C.L. it is to be noted that divergent political ideologies have been a continuing problem between the executives of the U.E.W. and C.C.L.

On March 24, 1949, the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers was suspended from the C.C.L. for the second time during the year. On this occasion the suspension was for an indefinite period and recommendations were made for expulsion. At the fall convention of the C.C.L. the executive council reported the steps that had been taken by it to suspend the I.U.M.M.S.W. and called for a vote on the recommendation to expel the union from the congress. The vote was in favour of expulsion. Since that time the C.C.L. and the United Steelworkers of America have been active in organizing workers in the mining and refining industry.

Between November 28 and December 29, 1949, labour conferences were held in London, England, with a view to forming a new international free trade union body to replace the World Federation of Trade Unions. The conference devoted its efforts to examining statutes and programmes for the proposed international organization as submitted by a preparatory committee. Agreement having been reached on these matters, it then became the founding congress of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Canada was represented at the conference by delegates from both the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and the Canadian Congress of Labour. Mr. Percy Bengough, President of the T.L.C. and Mr. Pat Conroy, Secretary-Treasurer of the C.C.L. played leading roles in the organization of the new international trade union body.

B. Distribution by Provinces

The provincial distribution of local unions and of the number and membership of those reporting is shown in Table III. As in other compilations on the basis of reporting locals, the failure of some locals to report regularly restricts the comparability of annual totals. Trends in provincial memberships are, however, indicated in the figures. While there appears to have been little change in the memberships of four of the provinces, the increase in membership over the year was well distributed among them.

As in several preceding years over sixty per cent of the reported union membership was in Ontario and Quebec. The largest numerical gain was in British Columbia with all other provinces registering lesser gains.

C. Distribution by Cities

Urban distribution of membership as shown in reports from local branch unions naturally favours the larger industrial centres. Montreal and Toronto together contain over twenty per cent of trade union membership. Table IV lists those cities from which membership of more than 2,500 was reported. It is noteworthy that all cities in Canada with populations of 30,000 or more are included in the lists among others of smaller size.

While Table IV is a valid indication of urban distribution, there are certain limitations on the statistical breakdown. First, reports from local branches do not cover the entire union membership, those for about ten per cent being unavailable. Second, the area covered by local union memberships is frequently wider than the urban community, conforming in many cases more closely to metropolitan or county areas. Where possible, Table IV is compiled on the basis of metropolitan areas.

In the 1949 survey, locals in 56 cities and towns reported a total membership of more than 2,500. Since the local unions reporting in different years varies the annual figures of individual cities are not comparable. For example, the total for the city of Windsor in 1949 is greater than in 1948, a result, in part, of the inclusion in 1949 of a large local which failed to report in the previous year.

D. Distribution by Industries

Membership figures classified according to industries are provided in two different classifications. The first is a continuation of the classification published in previous editions of this report, a description of which appears on pages 13 to 19 inclusive of last year's report. The second classification is new. It shows the statistical breakdown of memberships reported by the locals according to the industries in which each local reported the majority of its members to be employed. The standard classification of industries has been used in the second table. Table VII shows the numbers of new and dissolved locals, by industry.

E. Women in Trade Unions

Reporting local unions are requested to indicate the number in their memberships who are women. Many locals have been unable to do this since such information has not been included in their records. As a result, the figures below probably understate the case.

Female memberships, amounting to 93,474, were reported by 1,433 locals. These locals had a total membership of 403,199 of which the female membership made up 23 per cent. The present total is 4.6 per cent above that for 1948.

III. STRUCTURE AND MEMBERSHIP OF LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS IN CANADA

A. Union Structure

The term "organized labour" includes all organizations formed by trade union members. In Canada, the organizational structure built on the broad base of memberships in local branch unions is complex. First, locals are usually part of a parent union, the latter assuming many tasks in the interests of the locals. In addition, delegates carry opinions and aims of members in the local branches and in the overall unions to numerous secondary bodies. Varying in scope and purpose, these secondary groups pursue the economic and legislative objectives of their member unions in areas where local branch, or even parent union activity is not always feasible.

Unions in this country are of three types. The first is the international union with headquarters in the United States. Second there are national or purely Canadian unions; the third type is the directly chartered local or federal unions. Most of the unions in Canada are affiliated with one of the central labour congresses each of which has a system of delegate bodies, namely, local labour councils, provincial federations, district union councils and federations of unions in allied trades or industries. The two largest congresses are the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. Each of these organizations has several international unions among its affiliates. Those affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States are usually affiliated with the T.L.C. in Canada as are the directly chartered locals of the A.F.L. which are located in this country. The affiliates of the Congress of Industrial Organizations are usually affiliates of the C.C.L. Some international unions remain independent of either Canadian body. The remaining federation of any size is the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, whose members are practically all located in the Province of Quebec.

Of the international unions not affiliated with a Canadian Congress the most important are the four independent railroad brotherhoods of engineers, firemen and enginemen, conductors and trainmen. Most of the remaining railway unions are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States and the Trades and Labour Congress in Canada, the principal exception being the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour.

Local branch unions as well as local and federal unions directly chartered by the central congresses, are encouraged by their parent bodies to join delegate organizations. The primary purpose of those delegate organizations called labour councils and provincial federations is to advocate legislation in the interest of workers. District union councils and trade or industrial federations are primarily designed to advance economic interests.

(1) Local Branch Unions

For the labour union member the organization in which he may be active is the local union or union branch. This is the organization which he joins and to which he pays his dues. His local is the channel through which he may have contact with other organized workers. It is the agency to which he initially expresses his demands for better working conditions, seeks remedies for his grievances, and through which he participates in the broader economic and, on occasion, political program of the labour movement.

The local union frequently deals directly with the employers, although the parent organization may assist. Of recent years, there has been an increase in the participation of officials of the parent union in negotiations, especially in industries where collective bargaining on a multi-plant basis is carried out.

National and international unions define their local's powers and duties. Each local is required to adopt a constitution and by-laws and most international union constitutions provide that local by-laws and any amendments must be submitted to the international Executive Board.

Violations of established rules and regulations may result in suspension or expulsion of the local from the union. In this way, the union has a degree of control over basic policies, such as, membership qualifications, area and trade jurisdiction, and methods of suspension and expulsion of members. While subject to the rules of the International, each local has a voice in the formulation of rules and policies of its union through representation at general conventions. Every local union branch has the right to representation at the annual convention of the union and of the central labour federation or congress with which it is affiliated, usually in proportion to membership.

Local branches do not only constitute the basis of unions, they also group themselves into delegate organizations, the structure of which will be discussed in the following sections.

(2) Delegate Organizations

A system of delegate organizations is an integral part of each of the labour congresses and of some of the larger unions. Members elected to the various bodies as delegates carry to them the opinions of the electors. Delegate bodies may be drawn from locals of all unions of the same affiliation in a town or a city, known as local labour councils; for all unions of the same affiliation in the same geographical area and called provincial federations; for all locals of a single union in a given area and named district union councils; or for locals of unions in similar work or in allied trades and called union federations.

1. Local Labour Councils

A local labour council is a voluntary organization of delegates from union locals and local or federal unions in a town or a city directly chartered by a central congress. It affords closer co-operation among member locals in a community. As a delegate body, its main purpose is to serve as spokesman for organized labour in municipal affairs.

Although the local labour councils actively promote organization, they have no authority to issue charters, to order a strike vote or to encourage a strike except on request of national or international unions. It does not take part in the adjustment of wage contracts, wage disputes or working rules of affiliated local unions.

Local labour councils, like provincial federations, send delegates to annual conventions of central labour organizations with which they are affiliated.

2. Provincial Federations

The member organizations of provincial federations of labour include local branches of national and international unions, local labour councils and directly chartered or federal unions in the same province or area. These federations are directly affiliated with the central congress. Revenue is derived from a per capita tax on affiliated bodies.

Their purposes are similar to those of labour councils except that they are active at the provincial level. No provincial federation chartered by a congress is allowed to violate any of the laws as set out by the congress, nor adopt policies legislative, political, civic or organizational which are contrary to the policies adopted at the conventions of the Congress.

Affiliates of the provincial body are represented by delegates at its conventions. Also, every provincial federation chartered by a congress sends delegates to conventions of that congress.

The provincial executive committees of the Trades and Labour Congress have similar functions to those of the provincial federations. Members of these committees are elected by delegates from their respective provinces attending the convention of the congress while officers of provincial federations are elected at conventions of their own organizations. Local labour councils and provincial federations are directly affiliated with the central congresses.

3. District Union Councils

District Union Councils are combinations of locals of a single union. In some unions, they are referred to as "joint boards", while in others, they are called "conference boards" or "district union councils". In most unions, having joint boards or councils they are mandatory whenever the union has a given number of locals within the area, and all locals are required to belong.

The jurisdiction of these district councils varies. In some cases, it is confined to a locality where two or more local branches of the same organization are established. In other instances, it includes all locals within a stated area and occasionally, it extends to a whole province or even to the Dominion. Their authority and responsibilities also vary.

In contrast to local labour councils and provincial federations, most of the boards have legislative and executive powers on all matters relating to common interests of their member locals, including the ordering and terminating of strikes subject to the sanction of the general executive of the national or international union. Frequently, they have the sole authority to call strikes. Some also have the power to levy special assessments on member locals.

But district union councils are designed above all to bring greater unity of action to local unions and to strike for uniformity in wages, hours and working conditions among the workers within the union. The local branches are entitled to representation by a certain number of elected delegates. These "joint boards", like the union federations in allied trades, are not directly represented at the central congress. The revenue of district union councils is derived from a per capita tax paid by their affiliated union locals.

4. Union Federations in Allied Trades

Union federations usually called trades councils group local branches of more than one union in allied trades, whereas district councils include local branches of a single trade union. Union federations designed primarily for craft rather than for industrial unions, are established to achieve greater uniformity in wages, hours and working conditions for similar work. Their jurisdiction is usually confined to particular regions or localities.

They have broad powers to settle jurisdictional disputes among their member unions and to promote the common organizational aims. These federations are financed by per capita dues from their member unions, each of which is represented in the federated body. Like district union councils, however, they do not have direct representation in central congresses.

B. Canadian Labour Congresses*

There are three major labour congresses in Canada: The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. These three groups comprise almost ninety per cent of the total union membership in this country. Other groups of workers are affiliated with two smaller central labour bodies which are now active.

The major congresses are discussed separately in the sub-sections which follow. Table IX lists the numerical strength of these bodies as well as of the independent unions.

* For 1950 Officers of Canadian and International Congresses, see p. 32.

(1) Trades and Labour Congress of Canada

The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada is the central congress for 80 international and national unions as well as three regional and 288 local unions in Canada. The 2,865 branches of these unions have more than 450,000 members scattered in every province of the country. Members are to be found in most industrial divisions of employment; transportation, manufacturing, public and private service and many others. Its purpose, as stated in the constitution, is to promote "legislation in the interests of organized labour in the Dominion of Canada, and to assist in safeguarding the social and economic standards of the workers".

The T.L.C. is the Canadian counterpart of the American Federation of Labor in the United States, both being organized on craft lines and having many international unions in common affiliation. But the two organizations are autonomous. Although the general policies of the two bodies are often similar, they are independently formed and occasionally conflict. The Congress, through its constitutional directives concerning admission and expulsion of member unions, excludes organizations with jurisdictions conflicting with those of national or international unions already affiliated. Affiliation with the A.F. of L. is not an essential condition for admittance to the Congress.

Since 1921, the T.L.C. has published monthly The Trades and Labour Congress Journal, which deals with union problems and matters of interest to labour. Through this medium, the T.L.C. strives to promote the cause of labour before the general public and to keep members constantly advised of policies and activities. For the same purposes, and to advance the economic and legislative interests of members, the Congress establishes secondary bodies including local and district councils and provincial federations. The affiliated secondary bodies on record at the end of 1949 consisted of 58 local labour councils, of 88 district union councils and of 5 provincial federations.

Figures submitted by National and International unions together with the report of the Congress in regard to its 288 federal or directly chartered locals (56 chartered by the A.F. of L. and 232 by the T.L.C.) and in regard to its 2,577 local branches show the membership of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada for the year 1949 to be 459,068 (Table IX on page 25). At the 64th annual convention of the T.L.C., the total membership was reported by its executive to be over 450,000 (Table X, below).

The Treasurer's report for the year ended 30th June, 1949, as given at the last convention of the Congress held at Calgary, Alberta, in 1949, showed the following statement: $203,070.60 as total receipts from all sources and $189,157.04 as total disbursements leaving a balance of $13,912.56 which, after allowance for depreciation of $2,099.05, brought the net income to $11,813.51 and the surplus account up to $169,532.17.

(2) Canadian Congress of Labour

The Canadian Congress of Labour, the second largest labour congress in Canada has as its stated purpose the providing "to all Canadian workers, organized into unions of their own choice, Local, National or International, the fullest opportunity to unite for their common benefit, so that by their full participation and co-operation in one central body, the economic and social welfare of the workers of Canada may be secured and protected".*

The relationship between the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States resembles that of the Trades and Labour Congress and the American Federation of Labor. Most, but not all, of the C.I.O. unions with locals in Canada are affiliated with the C.C.L. Although both the C.C.L. and the C.I.O. are committed to industrial rather than craft unionization and follow similar policies, they are by no means identical organizations. The Canadian Congress of Labour is an autonomous centre, policies being formed by delegates representing its membership.

By means of Organizing Committees, special funds and other assistance, the Congress has always looked to "organizing the unorganized". But the aim of the Congress has become broader, "and, instead of being directed almost entirely toward the improvement of wages and working conditions, it now embraces programs of social security and similar measures, with a view to lessening or eliminating the risks of unemployment, illness, poverty and other preventable evils. Emphasis is being laid upon educational programs, so that workers may understand more clearly the economic and political principles upon which the institutions of government and industry are based".† This is the purpose of the Committee on Education and is considered an integral part of trade union functions. The department of Research supplies information to affiliated and chartered unions, to organizers, to provincial federations of labour and to the general public. For the information of the general public, and at the same time to keep its own membership informed, the Congress through its Public Relations Department, publishes monthly a bulletin called "Congress News" in addition to their journal, the Canadian Unionist. The Congress is also conscious of the efforts necessary in the political field "to promote the enactment of suitable legislative measures as well as of its responsibilities in regard to the improvement of industrial relations and the protection of the economic interests of workers through collective bargaining".‡

The Canadian Congress of Labour comprised at the end of December, 1949, 10 National unions with 337 local branches, 17 International unions with 665 local branches, and 173 directly chartered local unions.

During the past fiscal year, 5 new delegate organizations have been formed; four new labour councils and one Provincial Federation; so there are now on record of the C.C.L. 39 local labour councils, 6 provincial federations and 35 union councils.

(3) Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour founded at Hull in 1921 has functions similar to the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. It is, in contrast, an advocate of exclusively national unionism, being "opposed to control by American unions".* This attitude toward international unionism is more predominant in the Province of Quebec, in which membership of the Confederation is largely confined.

The Confederation strives to promote the interests of workers and unions before the legislative, judicial and administrative branches of government, and has divided affiliation with any existing political party. It aims to expand union organization and to provide technical and legal assistance to its members. Improvement in the labour and social laws are advocated by the Confederation with a view to improving employment and living conditions.

In October 1949, the C.C.C.L. established a Committee of Civic Action. This Committee, working in co-operation with the Service of Education and Research of the Confederation has responsibility for organizing services, meetings, films, lectures, and libraries. Le Travail, the bi-monthly journal published by the C.C.C.L. since 1924, deals with union activity, social and economic problems and matters of interest to workers.

The Confederation is made up of "Federations", composed of local branches or "syndicates", the latter being formed by union members engaged in the same profession, the same employment or in similar trades. The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour links together 16 federations each made up of local unions in the same industry, in addition to a number of local unions not connected with any of the federations but directly chartered by the Confederation.

According to the reports received by the Department of Labour from the Confederation and its member federations, at the end of 1949, of the 424 local branches or "syndicates", 85 were directly chartered and had a membership of 7,730. Of the 424 locals, 359 submitted a report on memberships totalling 80,089 (Table IX, page 25). The delegate bodies affiliated with the Confederation included 7 district union councils and 16 local labour councils.

C. Union Membership and Affiliation

(1) Local Unions Directly Chartered

Local or "Federal" unions chartered by the central labour bodies and having no connection with a national or international union numbered 563 in 1949, twelve above the number in the previous year. There were 232 directly chartered local unions having a membership of 31,185 and affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. The comparable figures for 1948 were 225 and 29,688 respectively. The Canadian Congress of Labour had 173 locals with 22,077 members at the end of 1949, an increase of 3 locals and 173 members over 1948. A.F.L. directly affiliated unions, also affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress, numbered 56 with a membership of 5,420 as compared with 49 locals and 6,383 members at the end of the previous year. The Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada has chartered 85 locals not affiliated with any of the federations which have a membership of 7,730.

The location of these unions in 1949, is shown in the list below. The name of the central organization is followed by the name and address of the president and secretary and this is followed by the names of the places in which directly chartered unions are located. Where possible this information has been revised up to the date of publication of this report. In the case of the American Federation of Labor, the names and addresses of the organizers in Canada are also given.

(2) National, International and Regional Unions

(a) Number and Location of Branches

Unions of larger than local proportions are listed in alphabetical order below and their affiliation (if any). Officers and number and locations of branches are also shown. In the case of international unions the names and addresses of the international presidents, secretaries, and of the Canadian officials are given, and in the case of each purely Canadian union, the name of the president and secretary. Unions formed in 1949, and those establishing locals in Canada in 1949 for the first time are printed in ordinary type, and others in italics. Where a union is affiliated with a central labour federation the latter is identified by a symbol, as shown in the key at the beginning of the list.

In the list below, there are 110 international and 57 national and regional unions which had Canadian members at the end of 1949. Of the international unions, 67 were affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and, as regards their members in Canada, with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; 10 organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States were unaffiliated with any of the Central Labour bodies in Canada; 16 were affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and, as regards their Canadian members, with the Canadian Congress of Labour, while 6 organizations affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States were unaffiliated in Canada. One organization which was unaffiliated in the United States was affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress in Canada and one organization which is also unaffiliated in the United States is affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour. Nine of the international unions operating in Canada were without central body affiliation either in Canada or elsewhere. Of the national or regional organizations 15 were affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress, 10 with the Canadian Congress of Labour, 16 with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, and two with the Canadian Federation of Labour; 14 national unions are not affiliated with any of the central labour organizations.

(b) Membership and Number of Branches

The number of branches and the membership of international and national and regional unions listed in the previous section are compiled in Tables XIII, XIV and XV below. Table XIII lists international unions with branches in Canada and in the United States. Table XIV provides similar information for national unions. Table XV includes the smaller national and regional unions. Membership figures in these tables have been obtained from reports for directly chartered locals submitted to the Department of Labour as of the end of 1949, from the central labour congresses, and from reports on membership which trade unions submit to the Department of Labour as at the end of the year.

The largest labour organizations, as reported to the Department, are unions of metal trade workers, construction workers, railway employees, wood and wood products' workers and miners. The International Union United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (C.C.L.-C.I.O.) with 60,000 members, has the largest membership reported by any union in Canada. It is followed in order of size by: the United Steelworkers of America (C.C.L.-C.I.O.) with 50,000 members, the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (T.L.C.-A.F.L.) with 37,210 members, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers (C.C.L.) with 32,500 members. The International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers (T.L.C.-A.F.L.) with 28,000 members, the International Association of Machinists (T.L.C.) with 26,686 members, the United Mine Workers of America (C.C.L.) with 25,124 members, the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees (T.L.C.-A.F.L.) with 24,201 members, the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America with 22,857 members.

The number of local unions having 1,000 or more members decreased from 123 in 1947, to 111 in 1948 and increased to 135 in 1949. In 1943 there were 108 locals with memberships of 1,000 or over, but in 1944 the number of such locals declined to 97 with a further decrease to 78 in 1945. However, in 1946 it increased again to a total of 87. The decreases in the number of large branches in 1944 and 1945, reflect the diminution of the production of war materials in large plants after 1943, and the increases in 1946 and 1947, indicate that many of these plants have been reconverted to the manufacture of peace-time products on a large scale. In 1943, there were three locals with 12,000 members, whereas in 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949, the largest memberships reported by any local union were 8,905, 8,115, 9,577, 9,533, 9,950 and 11,000 respectively. At the end of 1949, there were six locals with over 5,000 members, four in 1948, five in 1947, in 1944, there had been seven such locals, in 1945, four, and five in 1946.

(4) Union Federations in Allied Trades

Union federations, usually called trades councils, bring together local branches of more than one union in allied trades. They are not usually chartered by Canadian central labour bodies, but most of those 70 federations listed below are composed of locals of unions which are affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress. Their jurisdiction is usually confined to particular regions or localities, although Division No. 4, Railway Employees' Department of the American Federation of Labor has Dominion-wide jurisdiction, as have C.N.R. System Federation No. 11, and C.P.R. System Federation No. 125, which are affiliated with it.

The list given below contains 70 union federations in allied trades existing at the end of 1949. Reports were not received from all these organizations, but in the absence of direct evidence of dissolution, names and locations previously given have been retained; the names of officers have not been included in cases where no report was received.

Of the 70 organizations listed, 22 were in the building trades, an increase of 5 over last year, 2 in metal trades, 23 in printing and papermaking, 16 in steam railway transportation, one in other transportation and 6 in services.

All the building trades councils listed below are affiliates of the Building and Construction Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor and are subject to the rules of that Department. They have full autonomy in matters affecting organized workmen in the building and construction industry in their respective localities.

One of the two metal trades councils is affiliated with the Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor and the other is affiliated with the One Big Union.

Printing trades federations or councils are provided for in an agreement establishing the International Allied Printing Trades Association in 1911. This agreement includes the five international unions of book binders, printing pressmen and assistants, stereotypers and electrotypers, photo-engravers and typographers, all of which participated in the formation of the Association. Some councils also make provision for the inclusion of union lithographers.

The Quebec and Eastern Canada Council of Paper Mill Unions consists of two sections, one composed of local branches of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, and the other of locals of the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers; a number of local branches in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario also belong to this council, which is a voluntary organization. The Ottawa-Hull-Gatineau District Council of Paper Mill Unions (formerly the Northern Ontario District Council of Paper Mill Unions), includes in addition local branches of electrical workers, machinists, operating engineers and office workers employed in the pulp and paper industry. The Niagara District Council of American Federation of Labor Unions, includes electrical workers and longshoremen as well as paper makers in the Thorold-Merritton area. Division No. 4, chartered by the Railway Employees' Department of the American Federation of Labor, is the largest and most important federated body. It has jurisdiction over the organized shop mechanics on all Canadian railway lines, including machinists, boilermakers, blacksmiths, carmen, electrical workers, sheet metal workers, and the like. Local branch unions of these workers are brought together in a system federation covering the particular railway line on which they are employed.

Federations of public employees are often more diversified in composition than those in other industries. Their membership includes not only regular civic employees, but also the employees of street railway and telephone services where these are publicly owned.

The list below includes the names of all federations known to the Department of Labour and in the cases where these have been available the names and addresses of their officers, the number of affiliated unions and the total membership. Where there are regional or smaller federations affiliated with a national federation, the name of the latter is given first, with its affiliates named below it. Those printed in italics were formed in 1949.

E. Committees of Railroad Brotherhoods

The trade unions of railway workers, usually known as the railroad brotherhoods, have developed an elaborate organization of delegate bodies or councils, to promote and protect the interests of their members and in that way pursue the same aim as the other labour organizations. Each local branch or "lodge" of a union has a "grievance" or "adjustment" committee or a "protective board" for each railway line represented in the lodge, provided there are five or more members employed on the line. The chairman of these local committees constitute "joint protective boards" or "general grievance committees" for each railway system. These "committees" are designed to settle, with the management of the railway, grievances which cannot be resolved locally. They also act as negotiating committees in bargaining for collective agreements.

Legislative boards have been established by the four international railway brotherhoods of engineers, firemen and enginemen, conductors, and railroad trainmen to further the interests of the railway workers by petitioning for and improving the course of legislation in the Parliament of Canada or in the legislature of any province. A joint legislative committee representing these four unions together with the maintenance of way employees and the telegraphers provides for common action in the Dominion field. Similar joint committees including the same or other brotherhoods are established in the provinces.

The various committees of the railroad brotherhoods, with the names and addresses of their officers, are listed below. The names of the railroads over which the committees have jurisdiction are arranged in alphabetical order. Those which appear on this list for the first time are shown in italics.

IV. THE LABOUR PRESS

With the growth of the trade union movement in Canada, various labour organizations have developed their own journals. Unions rely on their publications to better acquaint members with activities and aims as well as with general matters of interest. Some union journals are confined to the news of their organizations but an increasing number cover a broader field. More and more unions use their journals for educative purposes, giving emphasis to social, political and economic matters and presenting a selection and interpretation of events.

Labour papers have been published in this country since the time of Canadian Confederation. A weekly publication known as the Union Advocate was published at that time in Newcastle, N.B. In the years after 1867 many small journals were, for short periods of time, active in various parts of the country.

The complete lists compiled by the Department of Labour date back to 1913. They show a steady increase in the number of union papers reaching Canadian trade union members. A large part of the growth in numbers has been in journals emanating from international unions. While the publications from international unions increased more rapidly during the two war periods, the papers issued by national unions rose more steadily to the present level.

Certain generalities can be made concerning the format of trade union journals. Firstly, those published in newspaper style have from four to eight pages, whereas those published as magazines vary as to the number of pages. The size of the paper is usually smaller than that of the regular daily press. They contain news commentaries and editorials on activities of the particular union and of the general labour movement. In addition, space is usually devoted to pronouncements on policy by the union executive.

International unions which send their papers to Canadian members adopt various methods for including Canadian news. Some simply have a section set aside for this purpose. Others issue a Canadian edition of the paper including most sections of the American edition or have a complete Canadian edition. Over a quarter of the journals include articles in French.

The majority of the publications are issued on a monthly basis, others are at some other regular interval: semi-weekly, weekly, bi-monthly or semi-monthly and monthly.

No information is available as to the circulation of the labour journals. However, the papers are usually distributed to all members of unions. If the publications of the various congresses are excluded, the total membership of unions and union organizations issuing papers, journals and additional publications directed to particular interest of workers, is over one million.

The union journals may be financed in several different ways. They may have a regular subscription rate or the subscription may be included in the per capita tax which members are required to pay and by that way unions are sure that a copy reaches every member. In other cases, the cost of publication may be paid from the general funds of the union and in still others, unions may sell advertising space in the paper as a means of raising funds for publication.

The editing and management of union journals are in most cases under the charge of the general secretary of each union. Some union locals issue regularly publications dealing with their activities, while others issue them only when there are membership campaigns, strikes or other events of particular interest to their members and to the community. No complete list of these publications is available.

In the following list, which is divided according to type of organization, the name of the union organization is given, its affiliation, the name of the publication and the editorial address.

Associations of teachers and certain other classes of public employees, including those on the payrolls of the Federal, Provincial and municipal governments, are outlined briefly below. Several of the organizations are full-fledged trade-unions; others are more in the nature of mutual benefit associations or advisory councils. Two associations of Federal Government employees, one of persons employed by the Province of Manitoba, one of persons employed by the Province of Alberta, one of persons employed by the Province of Saskatchewan, the British Columbia Teachers' Federation and several organizations of municipal employees are affiliated with either the T.L.C. or C.C.L.

A. Teachers' Associations

The British Columbia Teachers' Federation became affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada in January, 1944, marking the first time that a teachers' organization in Canada had joined forces with a recognized trade union central body. The provincial teachers' federations, shown in the following list, are linked together in the Canadian Teachers' Federation which was founded in 1919. The Federation, which reported a membership of 58,955 at the end of 1949, has existed since 1927, as a federation of the teachers' associations in each province, including the Newfoundland Teachers' Association.

The Ontario Teachers' Federation consists of (a) the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, (b) the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario, (c) the Ontario Public School Men Teachers' Federation, (d) Association of French Teachers of Ontario and (e) the Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association.

C. Organizations of Municipal Employees

The largest single organization of municipal employees in Canada is the International Association of Fire-Fighters (T.L.C.-A.F.L.). As shown earlier in this report this union has 84 local branches in Canada and a total membership of 6,100 persons. This union was expanded in 1948, by the addition of seven locals formerly part of the Canadian Brotherhood of Civic Employees.

At the end of 1949 the Trades and Labour Congress had 116 directly chartered local unions of civic employees with a total membership of 16,752 persons. The Canadian Congress of Labour had 18 such locals with a membership of 4,508.

VI. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONSHIPS

Besides the relationships between Canadian and United States sections of international unions, the Canadian central congresses have connections with organizations outside of Canada. While autonomous, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the American Federation of Labor on the one hand and between the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organizations on the other, the respective groups have much in common. The T.L.C. normally has in affiliation the Canadian sections of international unions affiliated with the A.F.L. and the Canadian sections of unions affiliated with the C.I.O. are usually affiliated with the C.C.L. However, this is not invariably so. The T.L.C. sends a fraternal delegate to the annual convention of the A.F.L. who brings in a report at the annual T.L.C. meeting. Furthermore, the T.L.C. sends a delegate to conventions of the British Trades Union Congress.

Relations with unions of many countries are maintained through affiliation of both the T.L.C. and the C.C.L. with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. This organization came into being late in 1949 at a conference held in London, England, attended by representatives of both Canadian central organizations along with trade union representatives from fifty-two other countries representing some 48,000,000 organized workers. In brief, the purpose of the I.C.F.T.U. is to unite the free and democratic trade unions of the world, co-ordinate their work and further their aims on a world-wide basis as well as to promote the interests of wage earners generally.

Headquarters of the new world trade union body is in Brussels, Belgium. Mr. Paul Finet, General Secretary of the Belgian Federation of Labour, is its President; the Secretary is Mr. J. H. Oldenbroeck, General Secretary of the International Transport Workers Federation.

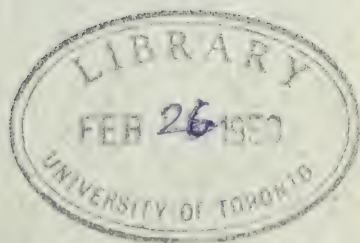

The Confederation is governed by a biennial congress, but in between, a General Council composed of representatives of affiliated organizations will meet to transact necessary business. In addition a 19-member Executive Board will meet not less than twice a year to deal with matters arising between conventions. Canadian unions are represented on the Executive Board by Mr. Pat Conroy of the C.C.L. and Mr. Percy Bengough of the T.L.C. The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour has not affiliated with the I.C.F.T.U. but has connections with the international Confederation of Christian Trade Unions, formed in 1920 at the Hague, to unite mainly the Roman Catholic Unions of several countries. The Christian International has declared itself "ready to examine with the I.C.F.T.U. methods of collaboration in the international field".

Also in the international field, a delegate selected from among Canadian unionists represents Canadian workers at sessions of the International Labour Organization. Government delegates and an employers' delegate also attend these sessions. The main object of the organization is, by international agreement, to improve world labour conditions through legislative action.

INTRODUCTION

The format of the Fortieth Annual Report on Labour Organization in Canada is considerably revised from that used in previous editions. The first part of the report deals generally with the extent and composition of the labour movement in Canada and includes most of the statistical material. The second part is a Directory giving detailed information about organizations within the labour movement arranged by congress affiliation. In addition to sections showing the organization of the various congresses including their delegate bodies and member unions, there appears at the conclusion of the present report an index of all unions which are listed in the various congress sections.

As in previous reports the statistical and other information was compiled from replies to questionnaires submitted by the Department of Labour to unions and congresses throughout the country. Two questionnaires were employed for this purpose. The first of these was completed by the national or international officers of the unions, and it is from these reports that the national membership figures were compiled. The second questionnaire is directed to local union branches throughout Canada. Reports from this source provided the basis for statistical series showing industrial, geographical and sex distributions of union membership. The coverage from the latter source is, however, incomplete and consequently the results form a separate statistical series from the national figures. All figures for the years up to and including 1949 are for December 31 of the year concerned and the latest figures are for January 1, 1951.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA, 1951

During 1950, the net increase in union membership was about 23,000 bringing the total at January 1, 1951, to 1,028,521 or more than 2 per cent above the figure for December 31, 1949. The proportion of union members to non-agricultural paid workers—approximately one in three—has shown little change during the twelve-month period. Moreover, the changes in membership distribution, both geographically and industrially, have not been significantly large.

Structure of Labour Organization

The structure of the various local and delegate organizations formed by unions has at its base local unions and at its apex central labour congresses. More than 5,400 locals are now organized on the basis of a common interest among workers in a trade, an establishment, or an area. Some locals remain independent but for the most part, they are units of 163 international, national, or regional unions.¹ For administrative purposes within the union, locals of a union located in the same area may be required to form regional organizations known variously as "district councils," "joint boards," or "conference boards." In addition, locals of a number of unions in an area may set up, for the purpose of inter-union co-operation, "trades councils" or "union federations" in which each local is represented. Such organizations, most common among craft unions, are composed of delegates from locals of unions in the same or allied industries seeking to achieve uniformity in working conditions within their area and to settle jurisdictional problems among the locals.

International, national, and regional unions in Canada are generally affiliated with one of the three large labour congresses—the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, or the Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada. These congresses also have in affiliation local unions which are not connected with any union and which are known as "federal" or "directly chartered" local unions. In addition, national labour congresses charter subordinate delegate organizations in the form of provincial federations and local labour councils, chiefly to co-ordinate the legislative endeavours of affiliates in the areas of their jurisdiction.

Union Members in the Labour Force

Although, nationally, almost 30 per cent of non-agricultural paid workers are union members, the proportion of the paid labour force organized in individual industries varies widely, from less than one per cent of the employees in financial institutions to over 70 per cent of the transportation workers. Between these extremes, union members in manufacturing, in mining, and in construction, comprise approximately 40 per cent of the paid workers in each industry, 20 per cent in public utilities and services, and slightly less than 5 per cent in trade. The more highly organized industries are those in which labour unions have a long history of organization, such as in transportation. But it is in the manufacturing industries that the largest number of union members are found and the largest increases in recent years have taken place. Over 40 per cent of total union members are employed in the manufacturing industries.

¹ Regional unions are those which have locals in one area of Canada as opposed to national unions which have locals throughout the country.

*Including the province of Newfoundland for the first time.

†Figures for 1949 and the years previous are as of Dec. 31. Figures for 1951 are as of Jan. 1, 1951.

Membership figures by industry, as shown in Table II, were compiled from reports by local unions. Eighty-seven per cent of the locals having about 93 per cent of total membership replied to the Departmental question as to the firm in which the majority of their members work. Consequently, even though the figures are not complete, they are a reasonably reliable indication of the industrial distribution of union membership.

From the December, 1949, and January, 1951 figures on an industrial basis, it appears that the largest increase of the past year has taken place in the manufacturing industries, where advances in such groups as iron and steel and textiles were recorded. The second largest membership change, that in the logging industry, reflects in part increased employment in the industry at the second of the two survey dates. In other industries where employment has been relatively stable over the past 12 months as in beverages, or unstable as in transportation equipment, a similar stability or instability in union membership is evident.

An increase in membership in each province over the past year is indicated by Table III. Ontario shows the greatest advance in numbers, but, percentage-wise, the largest membership increase, 27 per cent, took place in the province of Manitoba.

On a regional basis, there is considerable variation in the proportion of union members to non-agricultural paid workers. Based on local returns as recorded in Table III, the smallest proportion, 17 per cent, appears to be in the Maritime Provinces whereas the highest, 40 per cent, appears to be found in British Columbia. In Quebec the proportion is 22 per cent, in Ontario 24 per cent, and in the Prairie Provinces slightly over 25 per cent. With two-thirds of Canada's paid work force, the provinces of Ontario and Quebec together contribute 61 per cent of the country's union membership. British Columbia, with 9 per cent of paid workers, has 13 per cent of union members. The Maritimes and the Prairies contain 8 per cent and 10 per cent respectively of the total paid work force in Canada and 10 and 12 per cent of the total union membership.

A great majority of union members are to be found in urban communities having populations of 30,000 or more. Each of these communities contains

*Including unions having no locals but members at large.

2,000 or more union members as can be seen from Table IV, and together they account for three-quarters of the membership in Canada. Moreover, as may be expected, the greatest concentration of membership is to be found in the metropolitan centres of the country. The Toronto and Montreal areas together contain 20 per cent of the union members, and 9 other main industrial centres include a further 20 per cent.

The Department has for a number of years endeavoured to secure information on the numbers of women in trade unions in Canada. Out of the total locals surveyed, 1,441 or 27 per cent reported having female members to the number of approximately 100,000. From the information obtained, it is impossible to provide complete statistics as to the number of women in trade unions. For the locals which were able to supply the information, the percentage of female members is approximately 24 per cent. Female membership in unions for the locals reporting is shown by province in Table V.

Local Branches

The one million members of labour unions belong to 5,458 local branches varying in size from as few as 5 members to as many as 12,000. Over one-half of the locals have less than 100 members and over one-half of the total union membership in Canada is in locals of 600 members or less. Among larger units there is a concentration of approximately 200,000 members in locals having 1,000 to 3,000 members.

Although most local unions are chartered by unions 600 are directly chartered locals of the central labour congresses and 58 are entirely independent. It may be seen from Table VI that two-thirds of the locals with 70 per cent of trade union members are chartered by international unions. National and regional unions in Canada account for another one-quarter of the locals and 20 per cent of union membership.

Included in the total number of locals as reported for January 1, 1951, are 437 new locals organized during the past 12 months and having more than 32,000 members. During the same period 247 locals were dissolved so that the net change in the number of locals between the two surveys is 190. Classified industrially, as in Table VII, none of the industry groupings show a net loss in locals over the past year. The greatest number of new locals, and the greatest net increase in locals, is found in the relatively highly organized and expanding manufacturing industries. Two much less highly organized industries, trade and services, show fairly substantial net additions to the numbers of locals in the past year.

Unions

In terms of membership and the number of locals chartered, international unions are the predominant type in Canada. Approximately 7 of every 10 union members are members of locals chartered by international unions while 2 of every 10 are members of national or regional organizations. Referring again to Table VI, between December 1949 and January 1951 locals of international unions increased in number by 136 and in membership by 13,015 or slightly less than 2 per cent. Although locals of national and regional unions increased by 20, membership decreased slightly from the 1949 figure.

As a rule Canadian sections of international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States are affiliates of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and those of internationals affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States are affiliates of the Canadian Congress of Labour. A small number of international unions which are affiliated with one of these two congresses in the United States have unaffiliated Canadian sections. Conversely, a few internationals are affiliated with a congress in Canada even though they remain independent in the United States, (e.g., United Mine Workers of America). The Canadian congresses have also in affiliation a number of unions purely national or regional in scope. The remaining unions are entirely independent.

Approximately 14 per cent of union members in Canada belong to independent unions. This classification has grown during the past two years as a result of the expulsion from the CIO and the CCL of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, and the International Fur and Leather Workers' Union. Together these unions have about 55,000 members in Canada. Older independent unions include the railway running trades brotherhoods—the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and the Order of Railway Conductors—with a combined membership of 40,500.

Unions range in size from less than 100 members to more than 50,000. The majority of unions have 15,000 or fewer members although this group, as a whole, accounts for less than one-half of total union members as indicated in Table VIII. In contrast, the larger proportion of members are to be found in the 19 unions each having more than 15,000 members. The single group with the largest aggregate membership shown in the table are the 5 unions each having 30,000 or more members. Unions in the 15,000 members or more category are as follows:

Among the 19 largest unions, 9 are chiefly in the manufacturing industries; five are in the railways; construction accounts for three; and the remaining unions draw their membership principally from mining, logging and lumbering. These unions are primarily industrial, but a few are organized on both a craft and an industrial basis. The group is largely made up of international unions, three of which are independent.

Unions of all types and sizes numbering 52 reported the existence of district organizations—district union councils, joint boards, or conference boards—set up to handle many intra-union matters. Altogether 143 intra-union regional organizations are known by the Department to be in existence. The district organizations are shown with the information on each union in the Directory portion of this Report.

Inter-union co-operation among unions in allied industries of trades is frequently accomplished through trades federations or trades councils of which 64 were reported as at January 1, 1951. Federations are most often formed by locals of craft unions in the same industry, as for example, in construction, in printing, in the railways, or in the metal trades. Normally they are not affiliated with any of the Canadian congresses, but they are often chartered by the appropriate Departments of the American Federation of Labor which in reality are federations with the AFL of unions engaged in allied trades. Twenty-two federations are known to exist for unions in the building trades:

these are city-wide in scope, and are affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department of the AFL. Trades councils of Railway unions, both system-wide and local in scope, number 17 and are affiliated with Division No. 4, Railway Employees' Department, AFL. Only 2 trades councils, city-wide in nature, are known by the Department of Labour to be in operation in the metal trades, one of which is affiliated with the Metal Trades Department, AFL. Twenty-three regional and city-wide federations for unions in the printing and paper making industries are on record in the Department of Labour.

Congresses

Inter-union co-operation at the national level is accomplished by most unions through central labour congresses. The largest of the three major Canadian labour congresses is the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. Next in order of size is the Canadian Congress of Labour followed by the Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada. Two much smaller labour union bodies exist, the National Council of Canadian Labour and the Canadian Federation of Labour. The affiliated membership of the TLC has increased approximately 2.5 per cent since December 1949, slightly more than the over-all average increase. The membership increase in the TLC was mainly in international unions affiliated with both the TLC and the AFL, and in "Federal" unions of the TLC. The change in the proportion, between 1949 and 1951, in membership of AFL-TLC affiliation and membership of TLC

(1) The 65 local or federal unions with 6,993 members which received their charters directly from the A.F.L. are included under A.F.L. and T.L.C. above as they are also affiliated with the T.L.C. The totals of all Unions in Canada affiliated with the American Federation of Labor are the sum of these unions and the A.F.L.-T.L.C. unions, a total membership of 401,280 at Jan. 1951.

(2) The totals of all unions in Canada affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations are the sum of these unions and the C.I.O.-C.C.L. unions, a total membership of 206,445 at Jan. 1, 1951.

(3) The membership shown is for the affiliated unions which reported their membership to the Department.

affiliation only, as seen from Table IX, is largely explainable by the fact that the Canadian section of the International Association of Machinists has moved from the latter to the former group, the international having become affiliated with the AFL in the United States. Membership of unions affiliated with the CCL increased more than 3 per cent over 1949; for the CTCC the increase was more than 7 per cent. The inclusion of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers in the group of independent unions largely accounts for the increase in the total membership of that group shown in Table IX. Tables IX and X give the affiliated membership of the congresses, the former, from the reports of affiliated unions, the latter, from the last convention proceedings reports. The number of directly chartered unions for each congress along with their total membership will be found in Table XI.

Unions of the TLC-AFL group are often described as craft unions and those of the CCL-CIO group as industrial. While it is true that affiliated craft unions are usually found in the former group and industrial unions in the latter, the lines of separation are indistinct. Some unions entirely industrial in character are TLC-AFL affiliates, and many which in the past were regarded as craft unions now have locals organized industrially. On the other hand, a few unions of a craft nature are found in the CCL-CIO group. Unions affiliated with the Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada are all regional organizations, being federations of local syndicates in the Province of Quebec. Affiliates of the two remaining small congresses are mainly local unions.

Besides unions and directly chartered locals, the congresses have in affiliation provincial federations of labour and local labour councils. The number of provincial federations chartered at January 1, 1951, was 11, the same number as at December 31, 1949. Five are chartered by the TLC and 6 by the CCL. In addition, Trades and Labour Congress Provincial Executive Committees which perform the same functions as provincial federations, have been formed in 4 provinces where no TLC provincial federation is functioning. Local labour councils, 114 in number, were on record in the Department at the beginning of 1951. There were 61 local organizations chartered by the TLC as compared with 58 at December 31, 1949; 37 chartered by the CCL as compared with 35 in the previous survey; 16 chartered by the CTCC representing no change since 1949. A listing of provincial federations and local labour councils for each congress will be found in the Directory.

The four independent railway brotherhoods embracing engineers, firemen, conductors, and trainmen are not affiliated with any congress either in the United States or in Canada. These four unions together with two additional railway unions, the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees and the Order of Railroad Telegraphers are represented in a Dominion Joint Legislative Committee for co-ordination purposes. The Committee, like labour congresses acts as spokesman for the unions in many matters. The joint legislative committee arrangement extends also to the provincial level, 9 provincial joint legislative committees having been established. Information on the railway unions' joint legislative committees is contained in the Directory.

DIRECTORY

In the following directory of trade union organizations major statistical information together with the names and addresses of executive officers for each organization are presented. The arrangement is according to affiliation, data for each congress being followed by that for affiliated unions and delegate bodies.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION EVENTS - 1950

The general increase in the number of union members together with the expulsions of certain unions from central labour congresses represent the major developments in the field of labour organization since December 1949. One of the main issues at the annual conventions of both the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour was the problem of communist influence within the union movement. The Trades and Labour Congress took steps to bar a number of delegates suspected of communist adherence from its annual meeting and urged its affiliated unions to rid themselves of any officers having communist connections on penalty of possible expulsion. As a result, a number of unions took action to remove certain officers, and at least one directly chartered local union had its charter revoked by the Congress. The convention of the Canadian Congress of Labour concurred in the action of its executive in expelling the allegedly communist dominated United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America. In the first instance this action was taken over non-payment of per capita assessments by the union to the Congress. Further, this Congress empowered its Executive Council to expel any union whose officers persisted in following communist ideology. Previously the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers had been expelled, and early in 1951 the affiliation of the International Fur and Leather Workers' Union to the CCL was revoked by the Congress.

Other affiliates of the congresses have attempted to organize bargaining units formerly represented by the disaffiliated unions. Early in the year the United Steelworkers of America, with the sanction of the CCL, set about the task of bringing workers in metal mines and smelters into the steel union including those of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada in the Trail district of British Columbia and International Nickel Company of Canada at Port Colborne, Ontario. In certification proceedings the Mine, Mill Union was retained at both places. The Steelworkers' Union had greater success in the mining areas of northern Ontario and northern Quebec. It gained certification for the employees of several Ontario mines and succeeded also in negotiating contracts with a number of mining companies.

By the close of 1950 it had become evident that the Seafarers' International Union had largely displaced the Canadian Seamen's Union in Canada's Water Transport Industry. It will be remembered that the CSU's affiliation with the TLC was rescinded by the Congress in 1949. On April 20, 1951, the SIU was taken into affiliation by the TLC.

Although there have been some divisive forces at work as indicated above within the trade union movement, a tendency toward closer co-operation among the various labour bodies was also shown during the year. This spirit was evident at the time of the railway strike in statements of support issued by the central labour bodies. Later in the year it was announced that four major labour groups, the TLC, the CCL, the CTCC, and the independent Railway Brotherhoods, would present a joint brief to the Federal Government setting forth their views on price controls. Noting that considerable progress had been made in the matter of co-ordinated action between the AFL and the CIO in the United States in matters of common concern, this joint activity of the Canadian labour bodies was regarded as the possible forerunner of some form of permanent co-operative machinery.

Another step in the inclusion of Newfoundland trade unions in the Canadian union structure was accomplished during 1950 when the Newfoundland Federation of Labour became an affiliate of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. Its President was appointed a full time TLC representative in that Province.

In 1950 two legislative measures of particular interest to labour were enacted by the Newfoundland Government and a third was under consideration at the year end. The first, "The Trade Union Act", defines the legal position of unions; the second, "The Labour Relations Act", is a collective bargaining law similar in terms to the Federal Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act; and the third, still under consideration, is a workmen's compensation act.

Many individual unions inaugurated organizing drives during the year. Briefly, organizational activities of considerable significance on the part of three unions will be discussed.

In January 1950 when unemployment was at its seasonal peak, a CCL union of unemployed workers was formed, its objective being full employment. By June, this organization, the National Federation of Unemployed Workers, was reported to have established units in 25 Canadian centres. After that point, with steadily improving employment conditions, the union became less active.

Efforts of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union (CCL-CIO) to increase its membership appears to have met with a measure of success particularly in organizing a number of bakeries. The high proportion of unorganized workers in trade and service industries provides considerable scope for unions in this field. Singularly important was the RW and DSU's application for certification to represent employees of the T. Eaton Company, Toronto. This application for formal authorization as the bargaining representative of some 10,000 of these employees was under consideration by the Ontario Labour Relations Board at the end of 1950.

The International Woodworkers of America, concentrated largely at the west coast, sought to expand its coverage in the interior of British Columbia as well as in eastern Canada. In both areas some success has been indicated.

FOREWORD

The Forty-first Annual Report on Labour Organization in Canada contains the results of the 1952 survey of union organization carried out by the Canadian Department of Labour. The Report has two main sections. The first includes a statistical analysis of the extent and character of the unions presently active in Canada. In the second section, the Report presents a directory of the same organizations, their principal officers, publications, and the locations of Canadian branches.

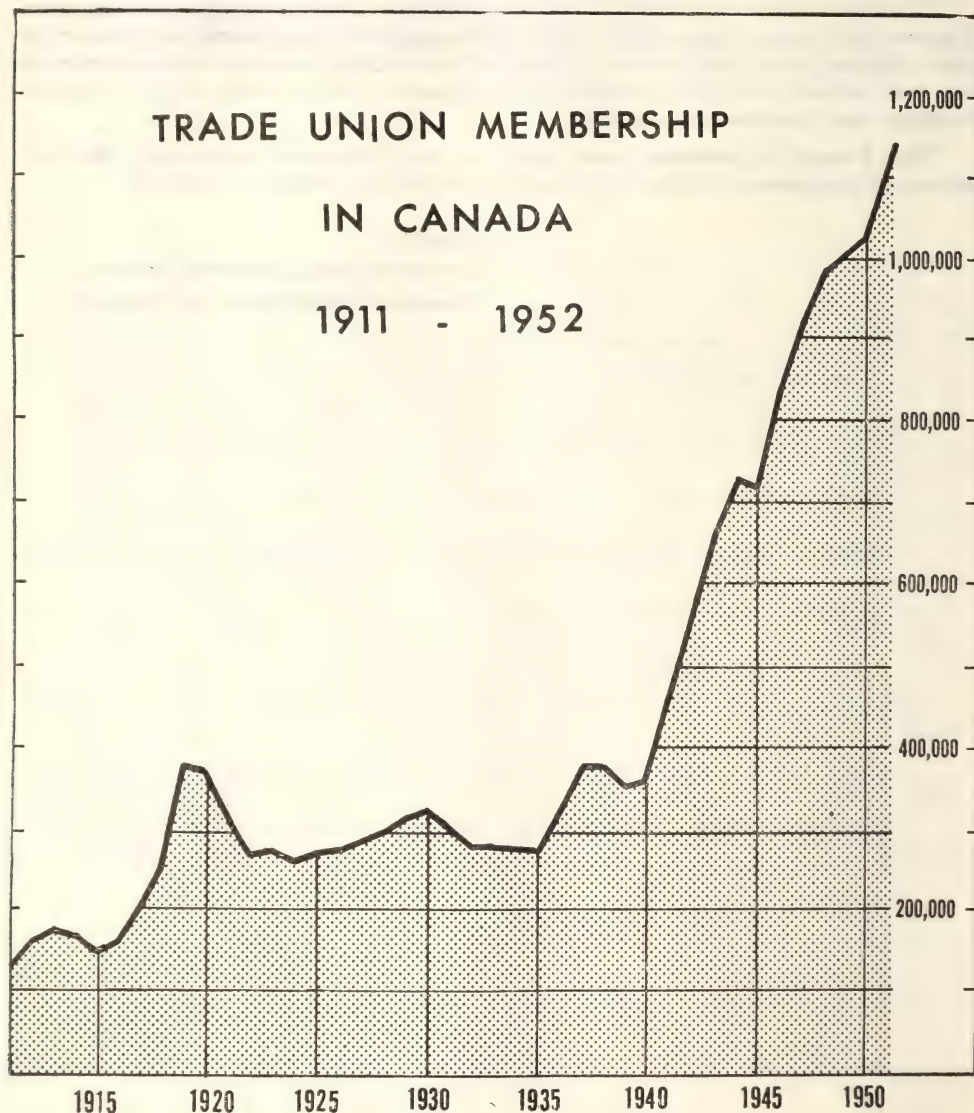

The information contained in the present Report represents the continuation of work first begun soon after the founding of the Department of Labour in 1900. Although the first Annual Report with statistical and descriptive material was not issued until 1911, information appeared periodically in the LABOUR GAZETTE over the decade previous.

The Report is prepared each year in the Collective Bargaining Section, Labour-Management Division of the Economics and Research Branch.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA, 1952

There were 1,146,121 members of labour organizations in Canada at the beginning of 1952, according to the annual survey of the Canadian Department of Labour. Many unions covered by earlier surveys reported gains in membership. However, the increase of 117,600 over the 1951 figure results in part from an increase in the coverage of the survey rather than from an increase in union membership. The current report includes returns from independent groups having a total membership of 24,350 which, although previously in existence, were not included in earlier surveys.

As in previous reports, the statistical and other information was compiled from replies to questionnaires submitted by the Department of Labour to unions throughout the country. Two questionnaires were used for this purpose. The first of these was completed by the national or international officers of the unions, and it is from these reports that the national membership figures were compiled. In a few cases, the returns from these sources appear to be estimates rather than exact totals of membership in good standing. The second questionnaire was directed to local union branches throughout Canada. Reports from this source provide the basis for statistical series showing industrial, geographical and sex distributions of union membership. The returns from local unions are somewhat incomplete, being based this year on reports received from approximately 86 per cent of the locals known to exist in Canada, and the results form a separate statistical series from the national figures. Together the two statistical series give information on all phases of labour organization in Canada. The various organizations which make up the union movement are described briefly before turning to the statistical results of the survey.

Structure of Labour Organization

When a worker joins a trade union, he becomes associated with a group at his working place for collective bargaining purposes. He has the right to take part in the affairs of the "local" through its business meetings, to vote on issues and in the selection of officers. It is likely, too, that his connections will extend beyond the local unit since most locals are part of a complex organizational structure which includes unions and their district organizations, union federations in allied trades, labour congresses and their subordinate provincial and city organizations.

Although a local may be an independent unit without outside connections, the great majority are units of trade unions which organize and charter many local branches. A union may be international, national, or regional in scope. An international union is one having local branches in the United States and Canada, for example, the United Steelworkers of America or the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America. Normally, the Canadian locals form a section of the international and many have their own slate of officers. A national union is one whose membership is entirely in Canada, but which has local branches in various regions of the country, for example, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers. The scope of a regional union is confined to a particular part of Canada. The syndicates of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, in Quebec, are in this category.

Unions are frequently categorized as craft or industrial organizations. An industrial union is one which takes into membership all workers in an establishment regardless of occupation. Unions of this type attempt to organize all workers in an industry and in most plants establish a single local. Actually many industrial unions have branched out to embrace industries other than the original one in which they function. A craft union draws its membership only from among employees in a particular skilled occupation which may cut across various industries. For example, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has locals of electricians in construction, pulp and paper, the railways and many other industries. An industry which is organized on a craft basis will have several unions representing employees in each establishment. The railways and construction are probably the best examples of industries organized on a craft basis. But few unions can be regarded as purely craft organizations since most of them have some industrial locals. The International Association of Machinists, for example, represents machinists on the railroads as a craft, but has organized all employees in a number of aircraft plants into industrial locals.

Through his local, the member joins with others at his work place; through his union, with workers in all establishments the union organizes. Unions, as a rule, hold periodic conventions to which all locals send delegates. At these, general policies for the union as a whole are worked out and officers are elected to administer union affairs between conventions. Canadian affiliates participate in the conventions of international unions which are commonly held in the United States; but Canadian districts may also hold conferences separately at which policies affecting their own section are worked out and the Canadian district officers elected.

While the relations between a union and its locals may vary among unions, the basic administrative principle is that locals pay a per capita tax to the union and in return receive certain services. These services include the provision of organizers or field men; in particular, a representative of the union may assist locals in bargaining and in settling grievances. Most unions publish material for the benefit of locals and their members. In some labour organizations, constitutions for locals are prescribed by the union. In others, locals may draw up their own constitutions and by-laws which must conform in general with those of the parent organization. Locals may have complete autonomy in bargaining agreements or their agreements may require the approval of the executive of the parent union. Similarly, strikes may or may not have to be approved by the executive.

For administrative purposes, and to promote co-operation among locals in particular areas, some unions have set up regional organizations known as "district councils", "joint boards", or "conference boards". Regional organizations may hold periodic conferences to deal with common problems of the member locals and to choose district officers. In some cases, union district organizations bargain with employers as a group on behalf of the locals.

Paralleling this joint action at the local level, co-operation may exist between entire unions. Federations of unions in allied trades at the industry level and labour congresses at the national level are the chief means for inter-union co-operation.

Unions representing various trades in the same industry frequently coordinate their activities through "trades councils" or "union federations", whose officers are elected from among the delegates of the various member units. These are most common among craft unions in the same industry such as in construction and in the printing trades. Their chief functions are to develop uniform bargaining policies for the member unions and to settle jurisdictional problems. In addition, some union federations enter into group bargaining with employers on behalf of the member unions.

Co-operation through trades councils or federations frequently takes place at both the parent union level and the local level. As an example, the AFL international unions in the building trades form the Building and Construction Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor and locals of these same unions are represented in subordinate city-wide organizations known as Building and Construction Trades Councils.

The large majority of unions in Canada are affiliated with one of the three central labour congresses—The Trades and Labor Congress of Canada, The Canadian Congress of Labour, or the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. Congresses represent national groupings of unions from all sections of industry, and, in addition, the congresses, as such, charter locals directly. Directly affiliated locals may subsequently be turned over to the appropriate affiliated unions, or a new union may be formed to combine a number of directly chartered unions in an industry if no affiliated union has jurisdiction over them. Also affiliated to, and chartered by, the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour are provincial federations or provincial committees as well as local labour councils sometimes known as city centrals. The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour functions almost entirely in the province of Quebec and, therefore, has no subordinate provincial organizations, but it charters a number of local labour councils.

A provincial or city federation of a particular congress is made up of the locals in the area whose parent unions are affiliated nationally to that congress. Also included are the directly chartered locals of the congress in the province or city.

Congresses hold annual conventions to which affiliated organizations send delegates. At conventions, matters affecting the labour movement are debated and passed upon and general policies for the guidance of affiliates are adopted. In addition, congress officers are elected to carry on its activities during the year financed by a per capita tax on affiliates. In matters concerning legislation, congress executives present to the government the views of their affiliates. Provincial and city organizations perform similar functions in the smaller areas.

In Canada, craft unionism is predominant among unions affiliated with the Trades and Labor Congress while industrial unions are more commonly found in the Canadian Congress of Labour. However, a definite distinction on craft-industrial lines cannot be made since some purely industrial unions are in the TLC and some craft unions are in the CCL. Furthermore, many craft unions have industrial locals. Within the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, the regional and local Catholic syndicates may be craft or industrial.

Customarily, the Canadian sections of international unions affiliated in the United States with the American Federation of Labor are affiliates of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada, though there are exceptions. A somewhat similar situation is found between the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States and the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Canadian sections of international unions of the CIO being generally affiliates of the Canadian Congress. The CCL also has in affiliation three unions which are independent in the United States, the largest of which is the United Mine Workers of America. Both congresses, in addition, have in affiliation purely Canadian unions and directly chartered locals.

Co-operation among trade unions extends internationally through the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions* which acts as a central congress for the free trade unions of the non-Communist countries. The TLC and CCL are both affiliated with the ICFTU.

Union Membership

More Canadian workers are members of labour unions today than at any other time. Not only is union membership at its highest level numerically, but the proportion of workers who belong to labour organizations is greater than in any previous period. In 1911, less than one-tenth of non-agricultural workers were members of labour organizations. In contrast, slightly more than thirty per cent of the present-day labour force belong to labour unions. From Table 1, it will be seen that union development as reflected in the survey has been uneven through the years. For example, the membership increase of 11.4 per cent over the past year has only been exceeded in twelve separate years since 1911, and the numerical advance of 117,600 members is among the largest recorded in the same period. As noted above, however, some 24,000 of this increase arises from an increase in the coverage of the survey.

*The general secretary of the ICFTU is J. H. Oldenbroek, 24 rue du Lombard, Brussels, Belgium.

Union organizations now draw members from almost all sections of Canada and its industries. Based on the reports of the union locals, Table II shows the numbers of union members by industry.

Almost half of Canadian union members are employed in the manufacturing industries and almost another quarter are employed in transportation, storage and communication. There is a contrasting situation in these two industries, however, since only about 40 per cent of the workers in manufacturing are union members while in transportation close to two-thirds of the workers belong to unions. The importance of unions in the other industry groups varies: large sections of the workers in the logging, mining, and construction industries are unionized; on the other hand, unions do not bulk large in trade, finance, and services.

Increases in the number of union members are indicated by local reports for most of the industry groups listed in Table II. Substantial increases in the logging and fishing industries arise largely from the first reports of unions in each industry in the province of Newfoundland. An increase of 20,000 members is indicated among employees in manufacturing. For the most part, the increases occurred in the food, clothing, non-ferrous metal products, and transportation equipment groups. The only section in which a decrease was reported is primary textiles. The inclusion in the survey for the first time of independent organizations of telephone workers in transportation and communication accounts for the major part of the advance in this group.

Table III shows the provincial distribution of union membership. It will be seen that more than half the total number are in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. These provinces, together with British Columbia, account for almost three-quarters of the total Canadian union membership. However, the extent to which the labour force is organized varies among the provinces. More than 40 per cent of the non-agricultural workers in British Columbia and in Newfoundland are union members and the proportion ranges between 20 and 30 per cent in the prairie, central and maritime regions of Canada.

The urban distribution of union members based on the reports of locals is shown in Table IV. Most cities with populations of 20,000 or more have more than 2,500 union members. Moreover, as may be expected, the greatest concentration of membership is found in the metropolitan centres. The Toronto and Montreal areas together contain over 20 per cent of the union members, and seven other industrial centres include a further 20 per cent.

The Department endeavours to secure information on the numbers of women in unions in Canada. From the information obtained, it is impossible to provide complete statistics, but, of the total locals surveyed, 1,577, or 26 per cent, reported having female members to the number of approximately 109,000. For the locals which were able to supply the information, the proportion of female members is approximately 23 per cent.

Local Branches

There are 6,052 local organizations in Canada, according to reports received by the Department of Labour, an increase of 594 during the past year. Almost two-thirds of these are chartered branches of international unions, and a further 25 per cent have received their charters from national or regional unions. The remainder are directly chartered locals of Canadian labour congresses or are independent locals (see Table V).

‡As reported by the Congresses.

Locals in Canada vary in size from less than 10 members to more than 15,000 members, but almost three-quarters have less than two hundred. These smaller locals, however, contain only one-quarter of the union members. On the other hand, somewhat more than one-third of union members are in the 158 locals, each reporting more than 1,000 members.

As noted above, information for this report is obtained from questionnaires sent to unions and to locals. The above information on the total number of affiliated locals is taken from the answers of parent unions. Although information was requested separately from all local units, 819 failed to return the completed questionnaire.

Unions—International, National and Regional

Unions active in Canada include 108 international and 62 national and regional organizations, which take in nine of every 10 trade unionists. Directly chartered and independent locals account for the remaining one worker in ten. The internationals have in their membership seven out of every 10 Canadian unionists as compared with two out of every 10 who belong to national or regional organizations. Over the past year, membership in international unions has increased by close to 71,000, and in the national and regional unions by a little more than 55,000 as shown in Table V. While the percentage increase in the membership of national and regional unions is comparatively large, within this group are found the several independent organizations surveyed for the first time in 1952, including those for telephone workers in various parts of the country and for fishermen in the province of Newfoundland.

The majority of unions in Canada have 5,000 or fewer members, but, in total, these account for less than 20 per cent of the Canadian membership. More than one-half are in 19 unions, each having 15,000 or more members (Table VI).

Among the 19 largest unions, nine are chiefly in the manufacturing industries; four are in the railways; construction accounts for three; and the remaining unions draw their membership principally from mining, logging and lumbering. The unions are primarily industrial, but a few are organized on both craft and industrial bases.

Unions numbering 53 reported the existence of district organizations (district union councils, joint boards or conference boards) set up to handle intra-union matters. Altogether, these unions have set up 129 intra-union regional organizations according to the reports received. The district organizations are shown in the individual union entries in the directory portion of this report.

Seventy-eight trades federations or councils were reported in the 1952 survey. Federations are most often formed by craft unions in the same industry, as for example in construction, in printing, in the railways or in the metal trades. Normally, they are not affiliated, as such, with any of the Canadian congresses, but they are often chartered by the appropriate departments of the American Federation of Labor, which in effect are federations of unions engaged in allied trades within the AFL. Twenty-four federations are known to exist for unions in the building trades which are city-wide in scope and are affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department of the AFL. Trades councils of railway unions, both system-wide and local in scope, number 16 and are affiliated with Division No. 4 Railway Employees' Department, AFL. Only two trades councils, city-wide in nature, are known by the Department of Labour to be in operation in the metal trades, one of which is affiliated with the Metal Trades Department, AFL. Twenty-six regional and city-wide federations for unions in the printing and paper-making industries are on record, as are three for civic workers, one for automobile mechanics, one for brewery workers, one for paper box workers, and four for miscellaneous groups of workers.

Most unions in Canada are affiliated with a central labour congress, but 33 remain independent. The independents include a number of international unions—the largest of which are the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, and the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America.

Unions representing the railway operating trades of engineers, firemen, conductors and trainmen have not affiliated with labour congresses either in the United States or in Canada. The Canadian membership of the unions representing these groups is 41,385.

Congresses

One hundred and twenty-five international, national and regional unions are affiliated with one or other of the three Canadian labour congresses—the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. The affiliated organizations of each of the congresses are listed below:

The total affiliated membership of each of the three Canadian congresses increased between January 1, 1951, and January 1, 1952, as compiled from the reports of member unions. The greatest increase both numerically and percentage-wise was in the TLC, being approximately 52,000 members and 11 per cent respectively. Smaller gains were recorded for the CCL and CCCL. Tables

VIII and IX give the affiliated membership of the congresses, the former from the reports of affiliated unions and the latter from the last convention proceedings.

Twelve international unions affiliated with the AFL in the United States have sections in Canada which are not affiliated with any of the Canadian congresses. Similarly, the Canadian section of one CIO union in the United States is not connected with a labour congress in Canada.

The four independent unions of railway operating employees together with two additional railway unions, the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees and The Order of Railroad Telegraphers, are represented in a Dominion Joint Legislative Committee for co-ordination purposes. The Committee, like labour congresses, acts as spokesman for member unions in many matters. The joint legislative committee arrangement extends also to the provincial level, nine provincial joint legislative committees having been established. Information on the railway unions' joint legislative committees is contained in the directory.

The three Canadian labour congresses, then, claim the affiliation of most unions active in this country. Ninety-two organizations remain without such affiliation. But in this group are the unions of railway operating trades which achieve co-operation through their Dominion Joint Legislative Committee and, as noted above, the 13 international unions active in Canada with affiliations in the United States but not in Canada. The remainder consists of 29 international or national unions which are completely independent and 47 independent local groups. A listing of all international unions with their affiliations and membership is presented in Table X. Table XI gives similar information for national and regional unions.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION EVENTS—1951

Events of major importance to labour organization in Canada during 1951 centred on the expulsion of Communist sympathizers from union ranks and legal decisions concerning the appointment of bargaining agents.

Communism in Unions. At the 1951 conventions of both the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour, further action was taken with respect to Communist groups within their membership.¹ The CCL officially expelled the International Fur and Leather Workers Union, which had been suspended by order of the Congress Executive Council during the previous April. At the TLC convention, confirmation was given to the action of its Executive in barring certain delegates on the grounds of Communist affiliation. Further, the Executive of the Congress was supported in its efforts to rid congress chartered groups of Communist representation.

In January, 1951, the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners expelled the executive of the Port Arthur local of its Lumber and Sawmill Workers division on the grounds that the local leadership followed Communist ideologies. While the union was successful in retaining control of the assets of the local, the expelled executive set up a competing union—the Canadian Union of Woodworkers. The latter union, after an active membership campaign in Northern Ontario and Quebec, was unable to obtain certifications for certain bargaining units in Ontario as held by the carpenters' union. No effort was made to obtain certification in Quebec.

The decertification of certain units of the Canadian Seamen's Union, as ordered by the Canada Labour Relations Board during late 1950, was upheld by the High Court of Justice of Ontario. The original order of the Board, as appealed by the Seamen's Union, was issued on the grounds that the union's efforts were directed toward political leadership rather than achieving the aims of a bona fide trade union.²

With the demise of the Canadian Seamen's Union over the past few years, the Seafarers' International Union has increased its strength among seamen both on the coast and in the Great Lakes area. Among the smaller maritime unions, there has been a considerable fluctuation. Some of the organizers from the former Canadian Seamen's Union staff have founded short-lived unions at various times during the past year or two.

Organizing Activities. The rivalry between the United Steel Workers of America and the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers to represent employees of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada at Trail, and Kimberley, B.C., continued through 1951.³

Following from the attempt of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, CIO-CCL, to win the bargaining agency at the T. Eaton Company store in Toronto, noted in last year's Report, a certification vote was conducted among the employees early in the year, the results of which were unfavourable to the union.

¹See 1950-51 Report, p. 17.

² See LABOUR GAZETTE, May, 1951, p. 697.

³In early 1952, a certification vote was won by the Mine, Mill union.

Union Affiliation. Several smaller unions which were noted in the directory last year have now amalgamated with other unions. The United Leather Workers' International Union has joined the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America; the National Union of Shoe and Leather Workers, CCL, has become part of the United Packinghouse Workers of America, CIO-CCL; and the International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Drop Forgers and Helpers has amalgamated with the International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Shipbuilders and Helpers of America. Like the National Maritime Federation of Canada, the Amalgamated Building and Construction Workers of Canada has now become part of District 50 of the United Mine Workers.

Inter-congress Co-operation. The formal machinery for co-operation between the executives of the major Canadian labour congresses, noted in last year's report, was ended by the action of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada at its convention in passing a resolution calling upon its executive to "revert to the policy in effect prior to the 1950 convention". This meant a withdrawal from the inter-congress committee which had been established with representation from all the major congresses and from the legislative committee of the railway brotherhoods. Up to that time, the major endeavour of the committee had been directed toward advocating the re-imposing of government price controls.

Gale Decision. Much interest surrounded the decision of Mr. Justice Gale in the High Court of Justice which quashed the certification by the Ontario Labour Relations Board of Local 87, American Newspaper Guild, for employees of the Circulation Department of the Globe Printing Company, Toronto.⁴ This decision was subsequently upheld in the Ontario Court of Appeals.⁵

The Forty-second Annual Report on Labour Organization in Canada contains the results of the 1953 survey of union organization carried out by the Canadian Department of Labour. The Report has two main sections. The first includes a statistical analysis of the extent and character of unions presently active in Canada. In the second section, the Report presents a directory of the same organizations, their principal officers, publications, and the locations of Canadian branches.

The information contained in the present Report represents the continuation of work begun soon after the founding of the Department of Labour in 1900. Although the first Annual Report with statistical and descriptive material was not issued until 1911, information appeared periodically in the Labour Gazette over the previous decade.

The Report is prepared each year in the Collective Bargaining Analysis Section, Labour-Management Division of the Economics and Research Branch.

Director,
Economics and Research Branch,
Canadian Department of Labour.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA, 1953

Labour unions reported a total membership in Canada of 1,219,714 at January 1, 1953, in the annual survey of the Department of Labour (See Table 1). This membership is 73,593 or 6.4 per cent higher than that reported at the beginning of 1952. No new union groups of appreciable size were formed during the twelve-month period and there were comparatively few local branches chartered. Thus, the growth indicates expanded membership largely within established organizations.

As in previous Reports, the statistical information and the Directory are compiled from replies to two sets of questionnaires submitted to union groups active throughout Canada. One questionnaire was completed by national or international officers of each union, and from these, national membership figures have been compiled. In some cases, returns from this source appear to be estimates rather than exact totals of membership in good standing. The second questionnaire was directed to officers of local union branches whose reports have provided the basis for statistical series showing industry and geographic distributions of union membership. The latter figures are somewhat incomplete, being based on reports received from approximately 87 per cent of the locals known to exist in Canada. In addition to membership figures, the questionnaires provided information for the Directory portion of this report on all the organizations which make up the Canadian union movement, from the smallest unit, the local or local branch, to the largest, the labour congress.

DEFINITIONS OF LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS IN CANADA

Local of an International or National Union.	The unit of labour organization formed in a particular plant or locality through which members participate directly in the affairs of their organization including the election of local officers, the financial and other business matters of the local, the relations between their employers and their locals, and to which the members pay dues.
Unaffiliated Local Union or Association.	A unit located in a single plant or area which is not formally connected or affiliated with any other labour organization.
Directly Chartered Local	A local which is organized by and receives its charter from a central labour congress and is not part of an international or national union. It pays per capita dues directly to the congress and receives services from the congress.
Union	The unit of labour organization which organizes and charters locals in the industries or trades as defined in its constitution, sets general policy for its locals, assists them in the conduct of their affairs, and is the medium for co-ordinating their activities. Finances are obtained from the locals through per capita dues. Unions usually hold regular conventions of delegates from the locals at which general policy is set and at which officers are elected.
International Union	A union which charters locals in the United States and Canada.
National Union	A union which charters locals in Canada only.
Affiliated Union	A union which is affiliated with a central labour congress.
District Council	An organization of locals of a union in a particular area formed to co-ordinate the activities and administer to the needs of the locals in the district. District councils may hold meetings of delegates from member locals to deal with matters of interest to them and at which officers for the district are elected. District organizations are also known as "joint boards" or "conference boards".
Allied Trades Federation	An organization of unions, or of locals of unions in a particular area, functioning in the same industry to co-ordinate the activities of the members and to deal with jurisdictional questions. Policies are established and officers are elected at meetings attended by delegates from member organizations. Trades federations may be known by other names such as "union councils", "union federations", "joint councils", and they are most frequently found in industries organized along craft lines.
Central Labour Congress	An organization having in affiliation various unions, directly chartered locals, provincial federations of labour, and local labour councils, for the purpose of broadly co-ordinating their activities at the national level including the relations between unions and governments and of establishing relations with organized workers internationally. Congresses hold annual conventions attended by delegates from affiliated organizations at which policies are established and officers elected. The congress also organizes local unions known as directly chartered locals. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on all affiliates.
Provincial Federation	An organization formed by a labour congress at the provincial level which has in affiliation the members of that congress in the province. It is organized and functions similarly to the congress in the appropriate provincial area only, except that it does not charter local unions. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.
Local Labour Council	An organization formed by a labour congress at the city level. It is organized and functions in the same manner as a provincial federation but within the scope of a city. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.

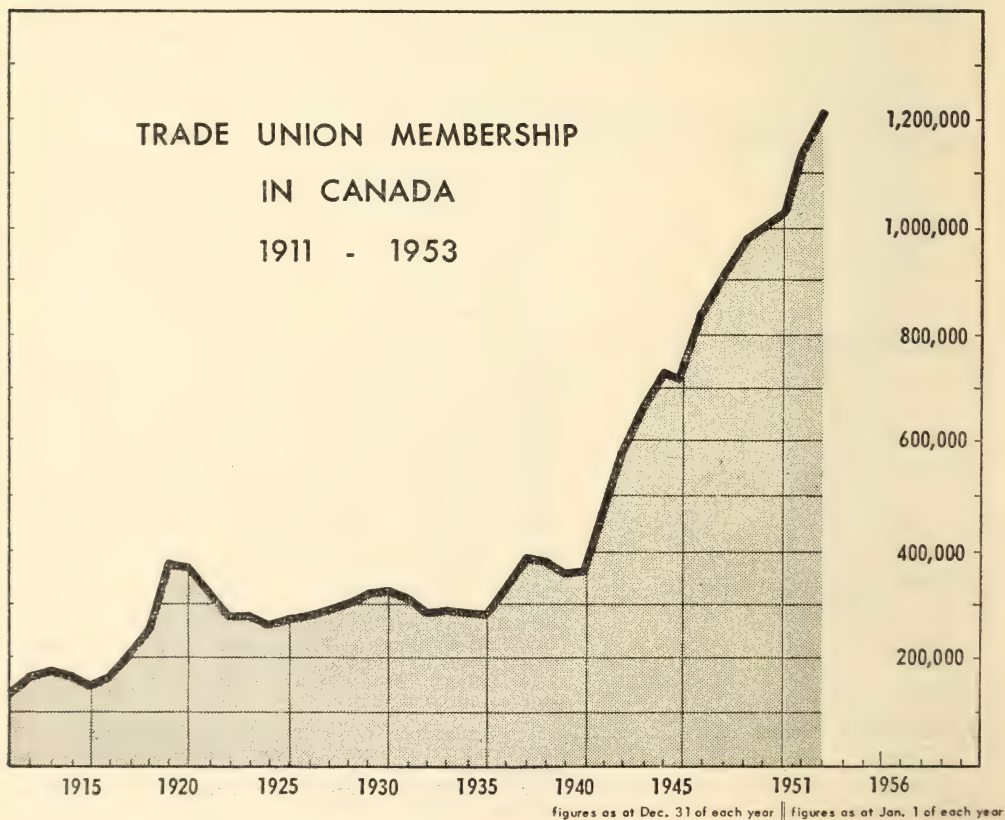

Most Canadian union members belong to unions which are either national or international in scope. They participate in the affairs of their union through local branches. There are 170 such unions in Canada which have 5,591 locals. Various unions work together on subjects of national and international significance to their members through their common affiliation with one or other of the central labour congresses. The three major labour congresses in Canada are the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour which, together embrace unions having more than 80 per cent of union members.

By and large, then, the union member in Canada belongs to a local which forms part of a larger parent union. The parent union, in turn, is affiliated with one of the congresses.

There are, however, a number of unions and locals which do not follow this general pattern. First, there are more than one hundred thousand workers in international unions not affiliated with the central congresses. This group includes unions for railway employees in the operating trades¹ which traditionally have remained unaffiliated. There are also several other international unions in this group, some of which have been expelled from the congresses.

Secondly, there are more than 85 thousand members of labour organizations who do not belong to international or national unions. Most of these workers are members of 598 local units directly chartered by the central labour congresses. The remainder are in local groups which have no affiliations.

¹The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Order of Railway Conductors of America and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

In addition to the basic organizations in the labour movement—the local, the union and the congress—there are several auxiliary organizations. Within the individual union, district councils are frequently formed to co-ordinate the activities of its locals in particular geographic areas. Within the congresses, delegate organizations are chartered at both the provincial and city levels in the interests of branches of member unions and directly chartered locals within the province or city (Provincial Federations or Provincial Executive Committees and Local Labour Councils). Within various industries, trades federations are frequently formed by various unions to co-ordinate the activities of their members.

Congresses

The three Canadian congresses have in affiliation 125 of the unions active in this country. All three congresses have national unions in affiliation, and of these the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, operating almost entirely in the Province of Quebec, is made up of such unions and directly chartered locals. Among the international unions, those affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States are normally affiliates of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada; unions affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States are normally affiliates of the Canadian Congress of Labour. A tabulation of the affiliated organizations in each congress is as follows:

¹ These unions are affiliated with the AFL in the United States.

² Sixteen of these unions are affiliated with the CIO in the United States. The other two are not affiliated with a congress in the United States.

⁴ Does not include 58 Canadian locals directly chartered by the American Federation of Labor and affiliated with the TLC.

The combined membership of the affiliates in each of the congresses increased between January 1, 1952, and January 1, 1953, according to the reports of member organizations (Table II). The percentage increase for each congress was as follows: Trades and Labour Congress, 6·8; Canadian Congress of Labour, 6·6; Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, 17·4.

Thirteen international unions affiliated with the AFL in the United States have locals in Canada which are not affiliated with any of the Canadian congresses. Similarly, the Canadian section of one CIO union in the United States is not connected with a labour congress in Canada.

The three Canadian congresses, then, claim the affiliation of most unions active in this country. Ninety-one organizations remain without such affiliation. In this latter group are the railway unions in the operating trades as noted below and the 14 international unions active in Canada with affiliations in the United States only. The remainder consists of 27 international or national unions which are without affiliation and 46 unaffiliated local groups. International unions, their affiliations and membership are listed in Table IX. Table X gives similar information for national unions.

The four unions of railway operating employees are not affiliated with any congress, but they, together with two additional railway unions, the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees (AFL-TLC) and the Order of Railroad Telegraphers (AFL-TLC), are represented in a Dominion Joint Legislative Committee. The Committee acts as spokesman for member unions in many matters. The joint legislative committee arrangement extends also to the provincial level, nine provincial joint legislative committees having been established. Information on the railway unions' joint legislative committees is contained in the Directory.

Unions

The increase in union membership over the past year has not resulted in any substantial change in the distribution of membership according to types of unions. The addition of almost 55,000 to the membership of internationals and the increase of somewhat more than 21,000 in the membership of nationals, maintains the three-to-one relationship of last year (See Table III). With few exceptions, the individual unions reported increases in membership. The net result is that a greater proportion of the membership is now in unions of more than 10,000 members and, more particularly, in the 30,000 members and over group.

Unions active in Canada include 109 international and 61 national organizations, which have in their membership more than 9 out of 10 unionists. The internationals have 7 out of every 10 Canadian unionists as compared with 2 out of every 10 who belong to national organizations. Directly chartered and unaffiliated local groups account for the remaining union members.

Most unions in Canada have small memberships, but a relatively few large unions account for the great proportion of organized workers. The majority of unions have less than 5,000 members but, in total, these account for little more than 15 per cent of the membership. On the other hand, more than half the members are in 21 unions, each having 15,000 or more members.

Among the 21 largest unions, nine draw their membership chiefly from the manufacturing industries; five are principally railway unions; three are mainly in construction; mining and smelting accounts for two; trade and the logging industries each account for one of this group of unions.

District Councils—Fifty-three unions reported the existence of district organizations (district union councils, joint boards or conference boards) set up to handle intra-union matters. Altogether, these unions have set up 132 intra-union regional organizations according to the reports received. Each district organization is shown under the entry in the Directory for the union of which it is a part.

Trades Federations—Seventy-two trades federations were reported in the 1953 survey. Federations are most often formed by craft unions in the same industry, as for example in construction, in printing, in the railways or in the metal trades. Normally, they are not affiliated as such with any of the Canadian congresses, but they are often chartered by the appropriate departments of the American Federation of Labor, which, in effect, are federations within the AFL of unions engaged in allied trades.

Twenty-one federations are known to exist for unions in the building trades which are city-wide in scope and are affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department of the AFL. Trades councils of railway unions, both system-wide and local in scope, number 11 and are affiliated with Division No. 4 Railway Employees' Department of the AFL. Only one trades council, city-wide in nature, is known by the Department of Labour to be in operation in the metal trades, which is affiliated with the Metal Trades Department, AFL. Twenty-three regional and city-wide federations for unions in the printing industry are on record as are four in the pulp and paper industry, five for civic workers, one for automobile mechanics, one for shipyard workers, one for brewery workers, one for paper box workers, and three for miscellaneous groups of workers.

OF UNION MEMBERSHIP IN 1953
as reported by local unions

Local Branches

Practically all of the 6,235 locals indicated by the survey to be in existence in Canada, are chartered branches of international and national unions or of congresses. As can be seen from Table III, almost two-thirds of the locals are branches of international unions and a further 27 per cent are locals of national unions. Much smaller percentages of the locals are directly chartered by congresses or are unaffiliated local groups.

Locals in Canada vary in size from less than 10 members to more than 15,000 members, but 77 per cent have less than 200 members each and 59 per cent reported less than 100 members each. One-quarter of the total membership is in locals in the less than 200 member category and only one-eighth of the membership is found in locals having less than 100 members each. On the other hand, 37 per cent of union members are in the 182 locals each reporting more than 1,000 members.

Industry and Geographic Distribution of Union Membership

The statistical information presented to this point has been compiled mainly from the returns of international and national unions. To provide the following information on the industrial and geographic distribution of union membership, it is necessary to use the returns from local unions. Although 789 locals did not respond, the total membership from local reports is 90 per cent of that reported by the parent unions.

Industry—Reports from local branches indicate, as shown in Table V, that although union members are found throughout Canadian industry, some, for example, manufacturing and transportation, account for large numbers while others, agriculture and finance notably, have few union members. Employees in the manufacturing group of industries make up 43 per cent of the union membership compiled from local returns and another 23 per cent are employed in transportation and communication. The service industry accounts for 11 per cent, membership being mainly in hotels, hospitals, municipal and provincial administrations, theatres, barber shops, laundries and restaurants. Other industries each account for less than 10 per cent.

For industry as a whole, slightly more than 30 per cent of the non-agricultural paid workers belong to labour unions. The proportions organized vary among the industry groups as follows:

Less than one-third organized	One-third to two-thirds organized	More than two-thirds organized
Service	Manufacturing	Transportation and
Trade	Mining	Communication
Finance	Construction

URBAN DISTRIBUTION OF UNION MEMBERSHIP IN 1953 as reported by local unions

60 per cent of the members are in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec and a further 15 per cent are in the province of British Columbia. However, the extent to which workers are organized varies among the provinces. More than 40 per cent of the paid workers in British Columbia and in Newfoundland are union members and the proportion ranges between 20 and 30 per cent in the prairie, central and maritime regions of Canada.

City—The urban distribution of union members based on the reports of locals is shown in Table VII. Most cities with populations of 20,000 or more have more than 2,500 union members. Moreover, as may be expected, the greatest concentration of membership is found in the metropolitan centres. The Montreal and Toronto areas together contain almost one-quarter of the union members, and seven other industrial centres, each having more than 20,000 members, take in another quarter.

INTRODUCTION

The forty-third annual report on labour organization in Canada contains the results of the 1954 survey of union membership carried out by the Canadian Department of Labour.

The report has two main sections. The first describes briefly the present structure of labour organization in Canada, and offers a statistical analysis of union membership by affiliation, industry and geographic area. In the second section, the report presents a directory of labour organizations, setting forth their principal officers, publications, and the location of Canadian branches.

The information contained in the report has been gathered through two sets of questionnaires.

The first questionnaire, completed by the national or international officers of the union, gives rise to figures showing the total membership claimed by the unions active in this country, the distribution of members through the various unions, and the affiliation of these unions with labour congresses.

Since many unions are active in a variety of industries, the returns from this questionnaire cannot be used to determine the industrial distribution of union members. Such information is derived from a second questionnaire, sent to local union secretaries. The returns for this second part of the survey also make possible the compilation of tables on the geographic location of union members, and are useful in general as a supplement to the information derived from the first questionnaire. They are, however, somewhat incomplete, being based on returns from approximately 85 per cent of the locals known to exist in Canada.

The information contained in the present Report represents the continuation of work begun soon after the founding of the Department of Labour in 1900. Although the first Annual Report with statistical and descriptive material was not issued until 1911, information appeared periodically in the Labour Gazette over the previous decade.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA, 1954

Labour organizations participating in the 1954 survey reported a membership of over one and one-quarter million Canadian workers. Some 48,000 additional workers joined these groups during 1953, to bring the total at January 1, 1954 to 1,267,911, or 4 per cent above the figure for one year earlier (See Table 1).

The steady growth in union membership which continued during the year took place largely within the existing pattern of organization. Increased membership appears to have been more in keeping with the growth in the labour force than the opening of new sectors of organization. The industrial and geographical distribution of members was not materially changed during the year. Nevertheless, the experience of individual unions varied. The major part of the expansion took place within international rather than national unions, and within the larger of these organizations. New local units established during the year were largely the work of this group of unions. More than two-thirds of the increase in membership and locals took place in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Structure of the Canadian Labour Movement

Most unions active in Canada are organized either nationally or internationally. National unions draw membership from locals in Canada only; international unions have locals in Canada as well as in other countries. The membership of

DEFINITIONS OF LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS IN CANADA

Local of an International or National Union	The unit of labour organization formed in a particular plant or locality through which members participate directly in the affairs of their organization including the election of local officers, the financial and other business matters of the local, the relations between their employers and their locals, and to which the members pay dues.
Unaffiliated Local Union or Association	A unit located in a single plant or area which is not formally connected or affiliated with any other labour organization.
Directly Chartered Local	A local which is organized by and receives its charter from a central labour congress and is not part of an international or national union. It pays per capita dues directly to the congress and receives services from the congress.
Union	The unit of labour organization which organizes and charters locals in the industries or trades as defined in its constitution, sets general policy for its locals, assists them in the conduct of their affairs, and is the medium for co-ordinating their activities. Finances are obtained from the locals through per capita dues. Unions usually hold regular conventions of delegates from the locals at which general policy is set and at which officers are elected.
International Union	A union which charters locals in the United States and Canada.
National Union	A union which charters locals in Canada only.
Affiliated Union	A union which is affiliated with a central labour congress.
District Council	An organization of locals of a union in a particular area formed to co-ordinate the activities and administer to the needs of the locals in the district. District councils may hold meetings of delegates from member locals to deal with matters of interest to them and at which officers for the district are elected. District organizations are also known as "joint boards" or "conference boards".
Allied Trades Federation	An organization of unions, or of locals of unions in a particular area, functioning in the same industry to co-ordinate the activities of the members and to deal with jurisdictional questions. Policies are established and officers are elected at meetings attended by delegates from member organizations. Trades federations may be known by other names such as "union councils", "union federations", "joint councils", and they are most frequently found in industries organized along craft lines.
Central Labour Congress	An organization having in affiliation various unions, directly chartered locals, provincial federations of labour, and local labour councils, for the purpose of broadly co-ordinating their activities at the national level including the relations between unions and governments and of establishing relations with organized workers internationally. Congresses hold annual conventions attended by delegates from affiliated organizations at which policies are established and officers elected. The congress also organizes local unions known as directly chartered locals. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on all affiliates.
Provincial Federation	An organization formed by a labour congress at the provincial level which has in affiliation the members of that congress in the province. It is organized and functions similarly to the congress in the appropriate provincial area only, except that it does not charter local unions. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.
Local Labour Council	An organization formed by a labour congress at the city level. It is organized and functions in the same manner as a provincial federation but within the scope of a city. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.

those international unions now active in Canada is almost entirely limited to this country and the United States, union headquarters for each of the unions being in the latter country. Most of these unions have Canadian district organizations or senior elected officials from Canada.

Various unions in Canada work together on subjects of national and international significance to their members, through their common affiliation with one or other of the central labour congresses. The three major labour congresses in Canada, which together have over 80 per cent of Canadian union members in affiliation, are the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, and the Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada.

In general, it may be said then that the Canadian union member belongs to a local which is part of a larger parent union. The parent union, in turn, is affiliated with one of the Canadian congresses.

There are, however, a number of unions and locals which do not follow the general pattern. First, more than 115,000 workers in the international unions are not affiliated with the central congresses. This includes international unions for railway workers in the operating trades¹ which traditionally have remained unaffiliated. There are also several other international unions in this group, some of which have been expelled in past years from the congresses. Second, there are more than 87,000 members of national and regional unions who do not belong to a central congress. Third, there are some 73,000 workers who are members of local units directly chartered by the central labour congresses. Of the remainder, 7,000 are in locals directly chartered by the American Federation of Labor and 8,000 are in local groups without wider affiliations.

In addition to the basic organizations of the labour movement—the local, the union and the congress—there are several auxiliary organizations designed to facilitate certain specific endeavours of the unions. Within individual unions, district councils are frequently formed to co-ordinate activities of its locals in particular geographic areas. Within congresses, delegate organizations are chartered on both the provincial and city levels in the interests of branches of member unions and directly chartered locals within the province or city (provincial federations or provincial executive committees and local labour councils). Frequently various unions active within a single industry form trades federations to co-ordinate the activities of their memberships.

Congress Affiliation

Congress organizations at the national level take in 127 of the 175 unions active in Canada, with the result that 83 per cent of union membership is represented in the three larger congresses. All three congresses have national unions and directly chartered local unions in affiliation. The Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada is made up almost entirely of such organizations, which draw their membership largely from the province of Quebec. Canadian affiliations of international unions are divided. Those international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States are usually affiliated with the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada; unions affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States are usually affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour. The distribution of these various types of organizations in each congress is indicated in Table II.

The membership of the congresses have changed somewhat over the past year, as shown in Table III. In the year preceding January 1, 1954, the membership of the TLC increased by 6.7 per cent, while the CCL advanced by 2.3 per cent. The CTCC affiliated membership decreased by approximately 4 per cent. Decreases in the CTCC are mainly from loss of membership in the textile and construction industries.

Advances in TLC membership have been in the International Association of Machinists, with an increase of 6,000 members, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, with 4,900 additional members, and the Railway and Steamship Clerks with an advance of 4,700 members. Construction unions have also gained substantially. Membership trends of the larger unions in the CCL were mixed. Decreases were reported by the United Mine Workers and the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers, but substantial increases were reported by the United Automobile Workers, whose increase of 7,000 was the largest recorded by any union for the year. The International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers and the Textile Workers Union of America recorded increases of 5,500 and 4,750 respectively.

¹The total union membership in Canada affiliated with the American Federation of Labor is the sum of the membership of these unions and the AFL-TLC unions, 505,540, at Jan. 1, 1954.

²The total union membership in Canada affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations is the sum of the membership of these unions and the CIO-CCL unions, 270,622, at Jan. 1, 1954.

Although most unions active in this country are in affiliation with one or other of the three Canadian congresses, some international and national unions remain without affiliation to them.

Eleven international unions affiliated with the AFL in the United States have locals in Canada which are not affiliated with a Canadian labour congress. Similarly, the Canadian sections of two CIO unions are not connected with a labour congress in this country.

In addition, seventy-seven organizations remain without any congress affiliation. In this latter group are the four railway unions in the operating trades as noted above; 5 international and 26 national and regional unions which are without affiliation; and 42 unaffiliated local groups. International unions, their affiliations and membership, are listed in Table X. Table XI gives similar information for national and regional unions.

While the four unions of railway operating employees are not affiliated with any congress, they, together with the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees (AFL-TLC), The Order of Railroad Telegraphers (AFL-TLC) and Division No. 4 of Railroad Employees Department (AFL), are represented in the National Legislative Committee (Canada), International Railway Brotherhoods. The joint legislative committee arrangement extends also to the provincial level, nine provincial joint legislative committees having been established. Information on the railway unions' joint legislative committees is contained in the Directory. Non-operating workers numbering 135,000 are represented by unions affiliated with the TLC or CCL. In bargaining with the railway companies, these unions act jointly through a general bargaining committee.

National and International Unions

Major membership increases over the past year have been principally among the international unions having more than 10,000 members. The result has been that a slightly greater proportion of Canadian union members are now found in international unions.

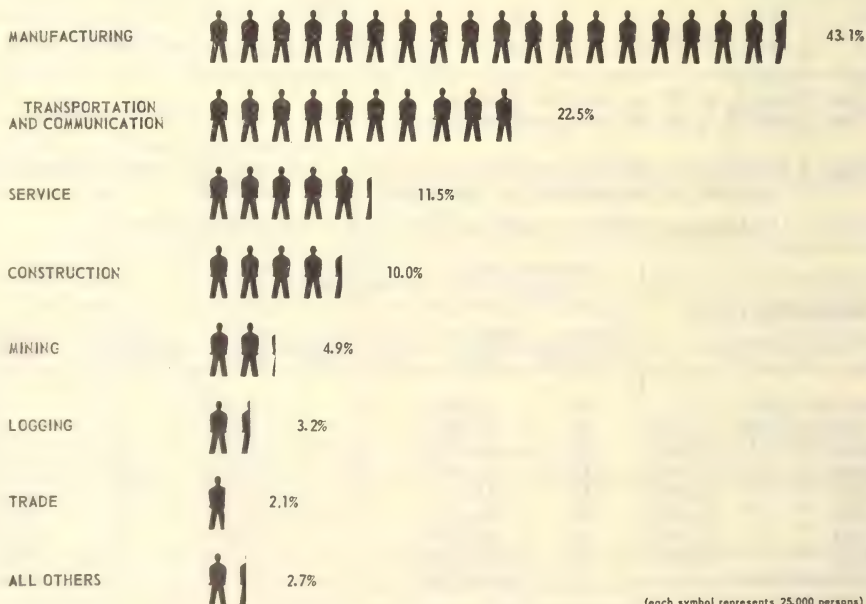

Some 45 of the unions this year reported decreases in membership, most of which were relatively small unions and a further six unions reported no change in members.

Unions active in Canada include 111 international and 64 national and regional organizations, which have in their membership more than 9 out of 10 unionists. The internationals have 7 out of every 10 Canadian unionists, as compared with 2 out of every 10 who belong to national organizations. Directly chartered and unaffiliated local groups account for the remaining union members.

Most unions in Canada have small memberships, but a relatively few large unions account for the large proportion of organized workers. The majority of unions have less than 5,000 members but, in total, these account for little more than 13 per cent of the membership. On the other hand, more than half the members are in 22 unions, each having 15,000 or more members (see Table V).

Among the 22 largest unions, nine draw their membership chiefly from the manufacturing industries; five are principally railway unions; four are mainly in construction; mining and smelting accounts for two; truck transportation and trade each account for one of this group of unions.

Local Unions

Practically all of the 6,425 locals indicated by the survey to be in existence in Canada, are chartered branches of international and national unions or of congresses. As can be seen from Table IV, almost two-thirds of the locals are branches of international unions and a further 27 per cent are locals of national unions. Much smaller percentages of the locals are directly chartered by congresses or are unaffiliated local groups.

Locals in Canada vary in size from less than 10 members to more than 16,000 members, but 76 per cent have less than 200 members each and 58 per cent reported less than 100 members each. Approximately one-quarter of the total membership is in locals in the less than 200 member category and only one-eighth of the membership is found in locals having less than 100 members each. On the other hand, 36 per cent of union members are in the 177 locals each reporting more than 1,000 members.

The steady increase in the number of local branches in Canada continued through to 1954. At 6,425, the total number of branches represents a gain of 190 over the 1953 total. About two-thirds of the increase in locals took place in the central provinces, Ontario and Quebec. Almost three-quarters of the increase in locals occurred in the international union group.

Auxiliary Organizations

Provincial Federations — There are in Canada 16 provincial organizations, each formed as a part of a congress, to assist in the provincial activities of the affiliated unions in the area. Nine of these belong to the TLC and seven to the CCL.

District Councils — Fifty-eight unions reported the existence of district organizations (district union councils, joint boards or conference boards) set up to handle intra-union matters. Altogether, these unions have set up 155 intra-union regional organizations, according to the reports received. Each district organization is shown under the entry in the Directory for the union of which it is a part.

Trades Federations — Seventy-five trades federations were reported in the 1954 survey. Federations are most often formed by craft unions in the same industry, as for example in construction, in printing or in the railways. Normally, they are not affiliated as such with any of the Canadian congresses, but most of them are chartered by the appropriate departments of the American Federation of Labor, which, in effect, are federations within the AFL of unions engaged in allied trades.

Twenty-four federations are known to exist for unions in the building trades which are city-wide in scope and are affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department of the AFL. Trades councils of railway unions, both system-wide and local in scope, number 11 and are affiliated with Division No. 4 Railway Employees' Department of the AFL. Two trades councils, city-wide in nature, are known by the Department of Labour to be in operation in the metal trades, which are affiliated with the Metal Trades Department, AFL. Twenty-four regional and city-wide federations for unions in the printing industry are on record, as are three in the pulp and paper industry, six for civic workers, one for automobile mechanics, one for brewery workers, and three for miscellaneous groups of workers.

Industry and Geographic Distribution of Union Members

The statistical information presented to this point has been compiled mainly from the returns of international and national unions. To provide the following information on the industrial and geographic distribution of union membership, it is necessary to use the returns from local unions. Although 955 locals did not respond, the total membership from local reports is 86 per cent of that reported by the parent unions.

It is to be noted that the total membership indicated on returns from local branches this year is below that of a year earlier. While this change in membership is not indicative of the trend in over-all union membership as shown from reports from parent organizations, the reporting locals are sufficiently representative to provide a valid indication of the industrial and geographical distribution of membership.

Industry — Reports from local branches indicate, as shown in Table VI, that although union members are found throughout Canadian industry, some, for example, manufacturing and transportation, account for large numbers while others, agriculture and finance notably, have few union members. Employees in the manufacturing group of industries make up 43 per cent of the union membership compiled from local returns and another 22 per cent are employed in transportation and communication. The service industry accounts for 11 per cent, membership being mainly in hotels and restaurants, hospitals, schools, municipal, provincial and federal administrations, theatres and other recreation services, barber shops and laundries. Construction accounts for 10 per cent and other industries for less than 10 per cent each.

For industry as a whole, 34 per cent of the non-agricultural paid workers belong to labour unions. The proportions organized vary among the industry groups as follows:

Less than one-third organized	One-third to two-thirds organized	More than two-thirds organized
Service	Manufacturing	Transportation and
Trade	Mining	Communication
Finance	Construction
Public Utilities	Logging

Province — Table VII gives the distribution of union membership by province from the returns of locals replying to the questionnaire. Sixty-three per cent of the members are in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec and a further 13 per cent are in the province of British Columbia. However, the extent to which workers are organized varies among the provinces. More than 40 per cent of the paid workers in British Columbia and in Newfoundland are union members and the proportion ranges between 20 and 30 per cent in the prairie, central and maritime regions of Canada.

City — The urban distribution of union members based on the reports of locals is shown in Table VIII. Most cities with populations of 20,000 or more have more than 2,500 union members. Moreover, as may be expected, the greatest concentration of membership is found in the metropolitan centres. The Montreal and Toronto areas, together contain almost one-quarter of the union members, and seven other industrial centres, each having more than 20,000 members, take in another quarter.

INTRODUCTION

The forty-fourth annual report on labour organization in Canada contains the results of the 1955 survey of union membership carried out by the Canadian Department of Labour.

The report has two main sections. The first describes briefly the present structure of labour organization in Canada, and offers a statistical analysis of union membership by affiliation, industry and geographic area. In the second section, the report presents a directory of labour organizations, setting forth their principal officers, publications, and the location of Canadian branches.

The information contained in the report has been gathered through two sets of questionnaires.

The first questionnaire, completed by the national or international officers of the union, gives rise to figures showing the total membership claimed by the unions active in this country, the distribution of members through the various unions, and the affiliation of these unions with labour congresses.

Since many unions are active in a variety of industries, the returns from this questionnaire cannot be used to determine the industrial distribution of union members. Such information is derived from a second questionnaire, sent to local union secretaries. The returns for this second part of the survey also make possible the compilation of tables on the geographic location of union members, and are useful in general as a supplement to the information derived from the first questionnaire. They are, however, somewhat incomplete, being based on returns from approximately 85 per cent of the locals known to exist in Canada, although covering 91 per cent of the membership reported by the parent unions.

The information contained in the present Report represents the continuation of work begun soon after the founding of the Department of Labour in 1900. Although the first Annual Report with statistical and descriptive material was not issued until 1911, information appeared periodically in the Labour Gazette over the previous decade.

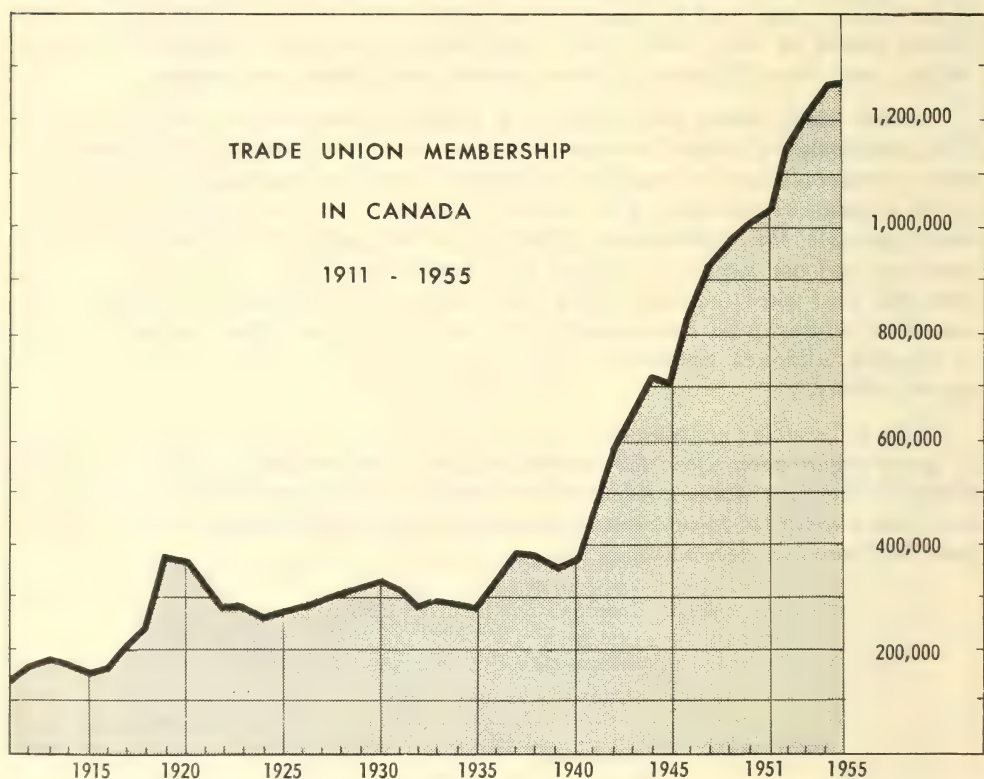

LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA, 1955

Labour union membership in Canada at January 1, 1955, was practically unchanged from the previous year. The annual survey of the Department of Labour for 1955 indicates a total membership of 1,268,207, an increase of only 296 over the 1954 figure (see Table 1).

The two largest Canadian Congresses achieved slight membership gains but some of the other groups lost a little ground. Contrary to the previous year's experience, the international unions showed an over-all decrease which was balanced by an increase in the national union group. The latter increase was due chiefly to the inclusion for the first time of two unions of federal civil servants which affiliated with Canadian labour congresses in 1954: the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada and The Canadian Railway Mail Clerks' Federation.

Organizations of Canadian Labour

The great majority of union members in Canada belong to either international or national unions, and participate in the business of their union through the local branch of the union. The international unions now active in Canada have their headquarters in the United States and their membership is almost entirely

DEFINITIONS OF LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS IN CANADA

Local of an International or National Union	The unit of labour organization formed in a particular plant or locality through which members participate directly in the affairs of their organization including the election of local officers, the financial and other business matters of the local, the relations between their employers and their locals, and to which the members pay dues.
Unaffiliated Local Union or Association	A unit located in a single plant or area which is not formally connected or affiliated with any other labour organization.
Directly Chartered Local	A local which is organized by and receives its charter from a central labour congress and is not part of an international or national union. It pays per capita dues directly to the congress and receives services from the congress.
Union	The unit of labour organization which organizes and charters locals in the industries or trades as defined in its constitution, sets general policy for its locals, assists them in the conduct of their affairs, and is the medium for co-ordinating their activities. Finances are obtained from the locals through per capita dues. Unions usually hold regular conventions of delegates from the locals at which general policy is set and at which officers are elected.
International Union	A union which charters locals in the United States and Canada.
National Union	A union which charters locals in Canada only.
Affiliated Union	A union which is affiliated with a central labour congress.
District Council	An organization of locals of a union in a particular area formed to co-ordinate the activities and administer to the needs of the locals in the district. District councils may hold meetings of delegates from member locals to deal with matters of interest to them and at which officers for the district are elected. District organizations are also known as "joint boards" or "conference boards".
Allied Trades Federation	An organization of unions, or of locals of unions in a particular area, functioning in the same industry to co-ordinate the activities of the members and to deal with jurisdictional questions. Policies are established and officers are elected at meetings attended by delegates from member organizations. Trades federations may be known by other names such as "union councils", "union federations", "joint councils", and they are most frequently found in industries organized along craft lines.
Central Labour Congress	An organization having in affiliation various unions, directly chartered locals, provincial federations of labour, and local labour councils, for the purpose of broadly co-ordinating their activities at the national level including the relations between unions and governments and of establishing relations with organized workers internationally. Congresses hold annual conventions attended by delegates from affiliated organizations at which policies are established and officers elected. The congress also organizes local unions known as directly chartered locals. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on all affiliates.
Provincial Federation	An organization formed by a labour congress at the provincial level which has in affiliation the members of that congress in the province. It is organized and functions similarly to the congress in the appropriate provincial area only, except that it does not charter local unions. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.
Local Labour Council	An organization formed by a labour congress at the city level. It is organized and functions in the same manner as a provincial federation but within the scope of a city. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.

in that country and Canada. Most of these unions have Canadian district organizations or senior elected Canadian officers. The national unions have locals in Canada only.

Most of the international and national unions are affiliated with one or other of the central labour congresses. The three Canadian labour congresses are the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada (Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour), which together comprise over 80 per cent of Canadian union members. The unions work together through the congresses on matters of national and international significance to their members.

An agreement to merge the two largest Canadian congresses, the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour, was made early in May 1955 by the executives of both Congresses, and was later ratified by the annual Convention of the TLC in late May. If it is also ratified by the CCL convention in October, a constitutional convention for the proposed Canadian Labour Congress, will be called in 1956. The Canadian agreement follows a unity agreement in the United States between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

There are a number of unions and locals in Canada which do not follow the general pattern. First, there are about 110,000 members of international unions which are not affiliated with the central congresses. These include international

Second, there are more than 86,000 members of national and regional unions which are not affiliated with a central congress. Third, there are some 52,000 workers who are members of local units directly chartered by the central labour congresses. Of the remainder 7,000 are in locals directly chartered by the American Federation of Labor and nearly 9,000 are in local groups without wider affiliations.

In addition to the basic organizations of the labour movement—the local, the union, the congress—there are several auxiliary organizations designed to facilitate certain specific endeavours of the unions. Within individual unions, district councils are frequently formed to co-ordinate activities of their locals in particular geographic areas. Within congresses, delegate organizations are chartered on both the provincial and city levels in the interests of branches of member unions and of directly chartered locals within the province or city (provincial federations or provincial executive committees and local labour councils). Within various industries, trades federations are sometimes formed by various unions to co-ordinate the activities of their memberships in that industry. (See Table III).

²The total union membership in Canada affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations is the sum of the membership of these unions and the CIO-CCL unions, which for Jan. 1, 1955, was 267,410.

*The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen; the Order of Railway Conductors and Brakemen; and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

Most unions active in Canada co-operate with free trade unions in countries beyond this continent. Both the TLC and the CCL are affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions*. A number of unions are also affiliated with international trade secretariats, such as the International Transport Workers Federation and the International Metalworkers Federation, which in turn are closely associated with the ICFTU. The CTCC is affiliated with the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions which collaborates on some matters of common interest with the ICFTU.

Congress Affiliation

The three Canadian congresses have in affiliation 130 of the 183 unions active in Canada and 84 per cent of the union membership is represented by them. Of the international unions, those affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the United States are usually affiliated with the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada; those affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States are usually affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour. All three Canadian congresses have national unions and directly chartered local unions in affiliation. The Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada is made up entirely of such organizations drawing their membership largely from the province of Quebec. The distribution of these various types of unions, as well as of auxiliary organizations, in each congress is indicated in Table III.

The secretary general of the ICFTU is Auguste Vanistendael, 148 rue de la Loi (Wetstraat 148), Brussels, Belgium.

The total memberships of each of the congresses have changed very little over the past year, as shown in Table II. In the year preceding January 1, 1955, the membership of the TLC increased by 0.8 per cent, while the CCL advanced by 0.1 per cent; the CTCC membership decreased by 0.5 per cent.

All changes in the memberships of individual unions affiliated with the TLC were less than 3,000. A new union, however, was chartered during the year, the National Union of Public Employees, with 18,000 members, made up entirely of locals formerly directly chartered by the Congress.

In the CCL, the United Steelworkers of America, and the United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America reported losses of 10,000 and 5,000 members respectively. Compensating gains for this Congress were 5,000 additional members in the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers and the affiliation of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, with 9,000 members. Other gains and losses of membership in affiliated unions were less than 3,000 in each case.

Although most unions in this country are affiliated with one or other of the three Canadian congresses, some international and national unions remain without affiliation to them.

Fourteen international unions affiliated with the AFL in the United States have locals in Canada which are not affiliated with a Canadian labour congress. Similarly, the Canadian section of one CIO union is not affiliated with a labour congress in Canada.

Ten international unions and 28 national and regional unions remain without any congress affiliation. In the international group are the four railway brotherhoods in the operating trades as noted above. In addition, there are 50 unaffiliated local unions. International unions, their affiliations and membership, are listed in Table X. Table XI gives similar information for national and regional unions.

While the four unions of railway operating employees are not affiliated with any congress, they, together with the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees (AFL-TLC) and The Order of Railroad Telegraphers (AFL-TLC) and Division No. 4 of the Railway Employees Department (AFL), are represented in the National Legislative Committee, International Railway Brotherhoods. The joint legislative committee arrangement extends also to the provincial level with nine provincial joint legislative committees. Information on the railway unions' joint legislative committees is contained in the Directory.

International and National Unions

Unions active in Canada include 115 international unions and 68 national and regional unions. Seventy per cent of Canadian unionists belong to international unions, 24 per cent to national unions; the remainder to locals directly chartered by one or other of the congresses or two unaffiliated local groups (see Table IV). Contrary to the previous year's experience, data at January 1, 1955, indicate a slight loss in the total membership of international unions and a gain in the membership of national unions. The major changes in individual unions have been noted above. Unions reporting increases in membership numbered 85, while 65 reported decreases; in other cases, no change was reported.

Most unions in Canada have small memberships, but a relatively few large unions account for the greater proportion of organized workers. The majority have less than 5,000 members, but in total, these account for only 13 per cent of the membership. On the other hand, more than half the members are in 24 unions, each having 15,000 or more members. (See Table V).

Among the 24 largest unions, ten draw their membership chiefly from the manufacturing industries; five are principally railway unions; four are mainly in construction; mining and smelting accounts for two; truck transportation, trade and service each account for one of this group of unions.

Local Unions

Practically all of the 6,673 locals indicated in the survey to be in existence in Canada are chartered branches of the international, national and regional unions or of congresses. As can be seen from Table IV, 61 per cent are branches of international unions, a further 30 per cent are locals of national unions. The remaining 9 per cent of the locals are directly chartered by congresses or are unaffiliated local groups.

Locals in Canada vary in size from less than 10 members to more than 15,000 members, but 77 per cent of the locals reporting showed less than 200 members and 60 per cent reported less than 100 members each. Approximately one-quarter of the total membership as reported by locals is in the less than 200 member category and only one-eighth of the membership is found in locals having less than 100 members each. On the other hand, 37 per cent of union members are in the 200 locals each reporting more than 1,000 members.

The steady increase in the number of local branches in Canada continued through to 1955. At 6,673, the total number of branches represents a gain of 248 over the 1954 total. The increases were distributed among all provinces except Newfoundland, the greatest being in the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia.

Auxiliary Organizations

Provincial Federations—There are 16 provincial organizations each formed as part of a congress, to assist in the provincial activities of the affiliated unions in the area. Of these, nine belong to the TLC and seven to the CCL. An additional nine provincial organizations are the provincial joint legislative committees of the railway unions.

Local Labour Councils—There are 135 local labour councils chartered by one or other of the three Canadian congresses to co-ordinate the activities of the locals of affiliated unions at the city or other limited area level. Of these, 75 are chartered by the TLC, 44 by the CCL and 16 by the CTCC.

District Councils—Sixty unions reported the existence of district organizations set up to handle intra-union matters. These are variously named district union councils, joint boards or conference boards. Altogether, these unions have set up 162 intra-union regional organizations, according to the reports received. Each district organization is shown under the entry in the Directory for the Union of which it is a part.

Trades Federations—Seventy-nine trades federations were reported in the 1955 survey. Federations are most often formed by craft unions in the same industry, as for example in the construction, the printing or the railway industries. Most of them are chartered by the appropriate departments of the American Federation of Labor, which, in effect, are federations within the AFL of unions engaged in allied trades.

Thirty federations are known to exist for unions in the building trades which are city-wide in scope and are affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department of the AFL. Trades councils of railway unions, both system-wide and local in scope, number 11 and are affiliated with Division No. 4 Railway Employees' Department of the AFL. Two trades councils, city-wide in nature, are known to be in operation in the metal trades, which are affiliated with the Metal Trades Department, AFL. Twenty-seven regional and city-wide federations for unions in the printing industry are on record, as are three in the pulp and paper industry, one for aluminum workers, one for automobile mechanics, one for brewery workers, and three for miscellaneous groups of workers.

Industry and Geographic Distribution of Union Members.

The statistical information presented to this point has been compiled mainly from returns of international and national unions. To provide the following information on the industrial and geographic distribution of union membership, it is necessary to use the returns from local unions. A total of 1,062 locals did not respond to the survey, but for 89 of the larger locals in this group it was possible to use an estimate of their membership. The total membership reported by or estimated for locals is 91 per cent of that reported by the parent unions.

Industry—Reports from local branches indicate, as shown in Table VI, that although union members are found in all major industry groups, some, for example, manufacturing and transportation, account for large numbers while others, notably agriculture and finance, have few union members. Employees in the manufacturing industry make up 41 per cent of the union membership compiled from local returns and another 23 per cent are employed in transportation and communication. The service industry accounts for 13 per cent. membership being mainly in hotels, hospitals, schools, in municipal, provincial and federal administrations, and in theatres, barber shops and laundries. Construction accounts for 10 per cent and the other industries for less than 5 per cent each.

For industry as a whole, 34 per cent of the non-agricultural paid workers belong to labour unions. The proportions of paid workers organized vary among the industry groups. Using the 91 per cent of union membership which it was possible to classify on an industrial basis, the accompanying chart illustrates these proportions for those industries having a substantial number of union members.

Province—Table VII gives the distribution of union membership by province from the returns of locals replying to the questionnaire, Sixty-three per cent of the members are in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec and a further 14 per cent are in the province of British Columbia. However, the extent to which workers are organized varies among the provinces. More than 45 per cent of the paid workers in British Columbia and in Newfoundland are union members, and the proportion ranges from 25 to 30 per cent in the maritime, central and prairie regions.

Labour Market Areas—Instead of classifying membership by cities (in some cases greater cities), as in previous issues of this publication, the Department has classified membership this year by the same "labour market areas" used in the statistics of the National Employment service which are published monthly in the Labour gazette. In most cases the area is named for the main city but includes the surrounding geographical area in which there is a concentration of industry. In other cases, such as "Niagara Peninsula" the area includes a number of centres. The greatest concentration of union membership is of course found in the metropolitan centres. The Toronto and Montreal areas together contain one quarter of the union members.

INTRODUCTION

The forty-fifth annual report on labour organization in Canada contains the results of the 1956 survey of union membership carried out by the Canadian Department of Labour.

The report has two main sections. The first offers a statistical analysis of union membership by affiliation, industry and geographic area. In the second section, the report presents a directory of labour organizations, setting forth their principal officers, publications, and the location of Canadian branches.

The information contained in the report has been gathered through two sets of questionnaires.

The first questionnaire, completed by the national or international officers of the union, gives rise to figures showing the total membership claimed by the unions active in this country, the distribution of members through the various unions, and the affiliation of these unions with labour congresses.

Since many unions are active in a variety of industries, the returns from this questionnaire cannot be used to determine the industrial distribution of union members. Such information is derived from a second questionnaire, sent to local union secretaries. The returns for this second part of the survey also make possible the compilation of tables on the geographic location of union members, and are useful in general as a supplement to the information derived from the first questionnaire. They are, however, somewhat incomplete, being based on returns from approximately 91 per cent of the locals known to exist in Canada, although covering 96 per cent of the membership reported by the parent unions.

The information contained in the present Report represents the continuation of work begun soon after the founding of the Department of Labour in 1900. Although the first Annual Report with statistical and descriptive material was not issued until 1911, information appeared periodically in the Labour Gazette over the previous decade.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA - 1956

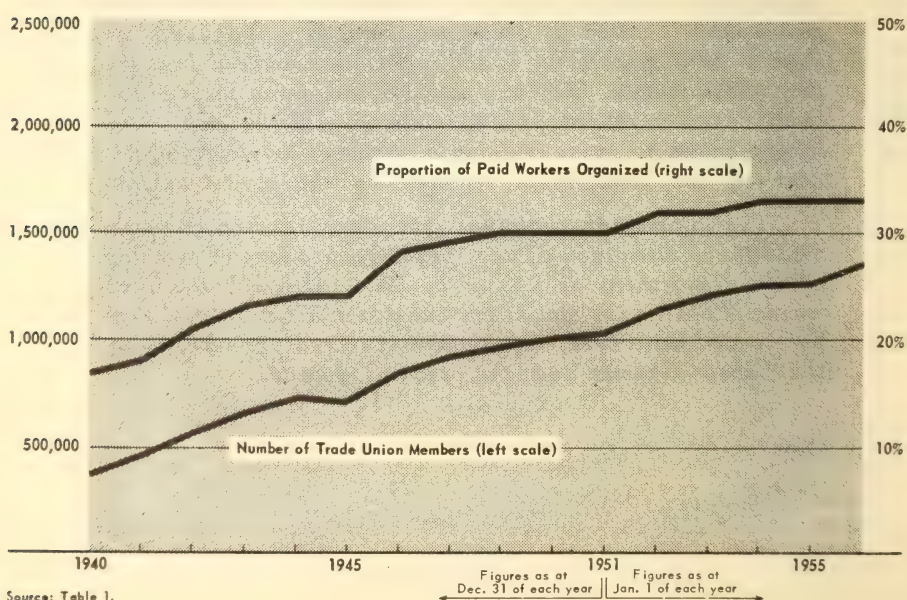

The merger in May 1956, of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour to form the Canadian Labour Congress has resulted in a major change in the structure of the Canadian labour movement. For over fifteen years, unions of differing affiliations have supported two major congresses; but now a single labour centre has been established covering three-quarters of the country's trade union members. Such action in Canada parallels a similar merger some months earlier in the United States to form the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations. As a result, the traditional designations for affiliations of unions in Canada—"AFL-TLC" and "CIO-CCL"—have given way to "AFL-CIO/CLC".

During the year immediately preceding the merger, the advance in trade union membership was one of the largest of the past five years—an increase of some 83,000 workers. It appears that the increase has taken place primarily within established centres of organization, without large-scale expansion into new geographic or industrial areas. The advances have barely enabled the labour movement to keep pace with expansion in the labour force; and the overall Canadian figure of approximately 33 per cent of paid workers organized has not been substantially altered.

Unions which entered the Canadian Labour Congress gained 56,000 of the 83,000 new members. This is somewhat less than proportional to their share of total union membership.

Almost two-thirds of the expansion during 1955 was in international unions in contrast to the decrease in the membership of these unions reported in the 1955 edition of Labour Organization in Canada. At the same time, national unions maintained their growth and showed the same numerical increase as last year.

NATIONAL ALIGNMENT OF UNIONS

The majority of Canadian unions have traditionally co-operated at the national level through their affiliations with congresses, confederations, and various specialized committees. The most important of these organizations have been the central congresses which have had a long and diversified history dating back as far as the 1870's. During these past 80 years, Canadian unions have supported several national congresses and other organizations proceeding along separate and at times conflicting lines. This diversity has arisen from differences over such things as methods of organizing, objectives of the labour movement and personal leadership.

During the past fifteen years the two predominant national bodies have been the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. As a result of their merger in 1956, the Canadian labour movement achieved a greater degree of unity than has been characteristic in the past. Now three-quarters of the country's union members are affiliated through their unions with a single labour centre. A brief summary of the steps leading to the original division and recent merger of the two Congresses appears on the following page.

The largest single group outside the new Congress is the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour which has in affiliation 15 unions with approximately 100,000 members mostly located in the Province of Quebec. This Confederation has traditionally remained independent of the TLC and the CCL. However, as noted below, there have been indications that the organization may join the Canadian Labour Congress.

Also outside the Congress are the 220,000 members who belong to the unaffiliated local, regional, national, and international organizations. These organizations, which account for 17 per cent of the union membership, have not become part of the central Congress for various reasons. Some have never joined a congress, some have joined but were later expelled, and others were refused admittance.

STEPS LEADING TO THE TLC-CCL MERGER

A. 1886-1940 Historical Background

(For summary of historical background see THE GROWTH OF LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA, 1900-1950; Labour Gazette, September, 1950, pp. 1395-1401, also reprinted in the 1949 edition of LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA.)

- 1886 Founding of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada.
- 1927 Founding of the All-Canadian Congress of Labour.
- 1935 In the United States, "The Committee of Industrial Organizations" was formed within the American Federation of Labor to organize workers in the mass production industries.
- 1936 Member unions of the "Committee of Industrial Organization" were expelled from the American Federation of Labor. These unions and others later formed the Congress of Industrial Organization which held its first constitutional convention as a separate organization in 1939.
- 1939 The Trades and Labor Congress expelled the Canadian sections of the CIO unions which then formed the Canadian Committee of the CIO.
- 1940 The Canadian sections of the CIO unions joined with the All-Canadian Congress of Labour to form the Canadian Congress of Labour.

B. 1940-1956 Steps Leading to the Merger

(Dates and pages in brackets refer to relevant Labour Gazette articles).

- 1940-1953 Resolutions favouring labour unity were passed at several annual conventions of the CCL and TLC, beginning with the very first convention of the CCL in 1940.
- 1950 The TLC and the CCL together with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour and the Dominion Joint Legislative Committee of the Railway Transportation Brotherhoods formed a joint committee to seek government control of prices.
- 1953 In the United States, the AFL-CIO no-raiding pact was approved by the AFL and CIO conventions.
- 1953 Committees were established by the CCL and TLC to meet jointly and to study ways and means of promoting closer relations between the organizations, and their eventual merger (L.G., Jan. 1954, p. 23).
- 1954 As a result of a decision reached at the first joint meeting of the two committees, the TLC and CCL co-operated in presenting a joint brief to the Federal Cabinet on unemployment (L.G., Feb. 1954, p. 217, and March 1954, p. 346).
- 1954 Approval of a no-raiding agreement in Canada.
 - February - a no-raiding agreement was recommended by the joint committee (L.G., Feb. 1954, p. 217).
 - August - the TLC annual convention approved the no-raiding agreement (L.G., Sept. 1954, p. 1248).
 - September - the CCL convention approved the agreement (L.G., Oct. 1954, p. 1395).
 - November - the officers of both congresses signed the no-raiding agreement to become effective on January 1, 1955.
- 1954 In the United States, resolutions calling for merger were passed by the AFL and CIO.
- 1955 Approval of the merger in Canada.
 - March - Tentative agreement on the terms of merger was reached by the joint committee (L.G., April 1955, p. 393).
 - May - Final agreement reached (L.G., May 1955, p. 506).
 - June - The TLC annual convention approved the principle and terms of the merger as recommended by the committee (L.G., July 1955, p. 758).
 - October - The CCL convention approved the merger (L.G., Nov. 1955, p. 1245).
- 1955 In the United States, the first convention of the merged federation of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organization was held in December.
- 1956 In Canada the Founding Convention of the merged congresses met in April as the Canadian Labour Congress (L.G., June 1956, p. 634).

About half of these unaffiliated members are in international unions. The four International Railway Brotherhoods, which together have 44,000 members, have traditionally remained independent of central congresses, although they have acted together through their joint legislative committee.

Several large international unions have remained unaffiliated following their suspension or expulsion from the CCL for such reasons as jurisdictional disputes, or alleged communist domination.

The United Mine Workers of America had been an affiliate of the CCL for many years, but it was suspended late in 1955 for non-payment of per capita fees and did not enter the merger. However, resolutions were passed at the CLC founding convention directing the executive to invite the UMWA to join the national Congress. Also for jurisdictional reasons, the United Gas, Coke and Chemical Workers of America was refused admittance to the CCL even though it had affiliation with the CIO in the United States. However, during 1955 it merged with a union which did have CCL affiliation and its membership are now part of the new Congress.

The United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America was expelled from the CCL in 1950 following the expulsion in the previous year of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. These unions have remained unaffiliated. The International Fur and Leather Workers Union of the United States and Canada was also expelled from the CCL but it merged with a TLC union and its members are now affiliated with the CLC.

Several national and local unions are also not affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress. Most of these have relatively small memberships.

The Canadian Labour Congress

The importance of the merger in giving new shape to the Canadian labour movement can be measured in several ways:

- the CLC has in affiliation three-quarters of Canadian union members;
- its more than 1,000,000 members belong to 117 national and international unions with 5,200 separate locals which, together with 432 directly chartered local unions, negotiate over 5,600 separate labour-management agreements;
- within the new Congress, many unions with similar jurisdictions are discussing amalgamation;
- it has inherited an extensive system of 16 provincial and 122 local secondary bodies from the TLC and CCL. Where these organizations overlap, merger discussions are taking place;
- it has a staff of over 100 people, organized in 9 departments, providing specialized services for its affiliated membership—including organizing and educational assistance as well as public relations programs and research facilities. This is illustrated in the chart showing the structure of the new Congress.

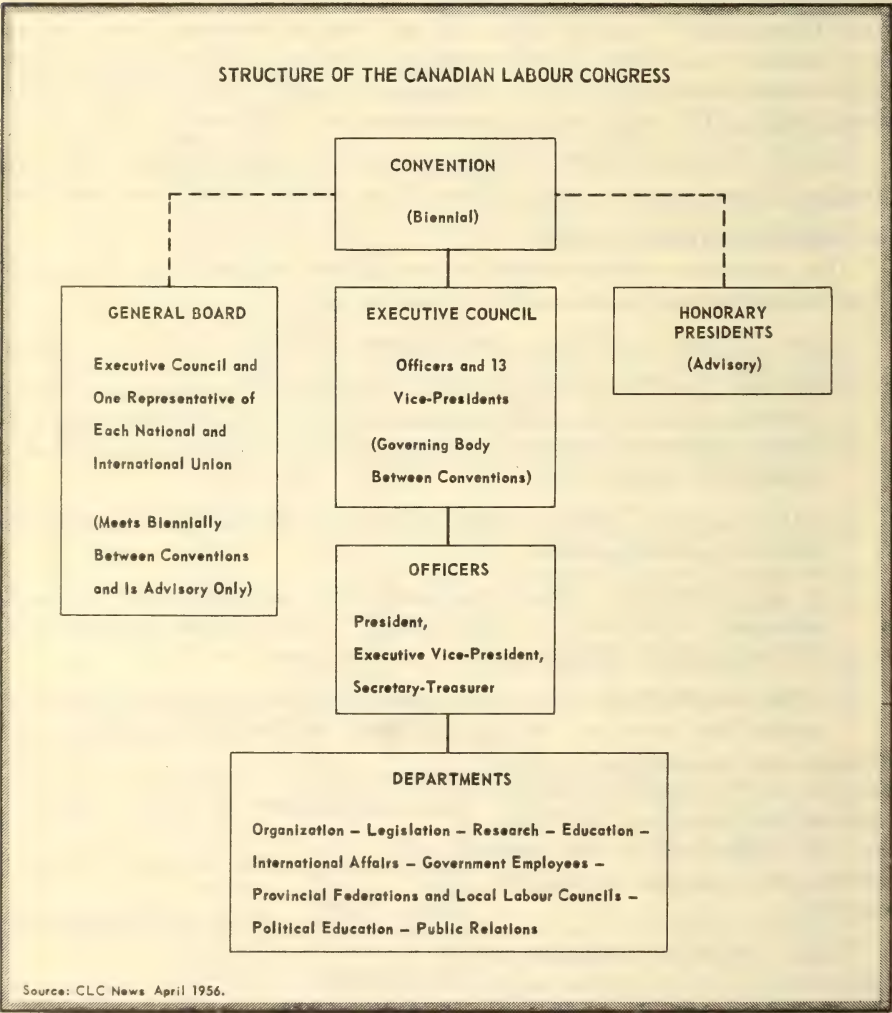

Table 2 presents a breakdown of membership by congress as it existed on January 1, 1956. It shows that during the final year of their separate activities the TLC and CCL had advances of 6.5 and 4.6 per cent respectively. As a result, the membership represented at the founding convention of the CLC was approximately 1,020,000 workers. In Table 2A, conditions after the formation of the CLC are estimated. This table includes a larger membership in the CLC than would have arisen from a purely TLC-CCL merger. The One Big Union, which has membership from a variety of occupations in the Winnipeg area, joined the Congress at the merger convention and made arrangements to discuss the transfer of its members to CLC unions.

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour reported a small increase in membership during the year preceding January 1, 1956, offsetting the slight decrease experienced the previous year and bringing its membership to slightly over 100,000 members. This increase appears to have been mainly attributable to the gains of the National Metal Trades Federation, where some 2,000 workers were reported to have joined.

Fewer local unions were affiliated with the Confederation this year than a year ago, but this was for the most part the result of the merging of groups of locals into a single unit. For example, the amalgamation of eight locals of paper box workers in the Montreal area resulted in a single organization.

There have been discussions between the CCCL and the Canadian Labour Congress on the possibility of the former organization joining the Congress. It appears from official statements that the method of affiliation supported by the CCCL is to enter as a unit with membership in various industries throughout the Province of Quebec. The proposal presents difficulties apparently arising from the possible conflict between the jurisdictions of the Confederation and other unions within the Congress. However, delegates to the merger convention instructed the executive to investigate bringing this organization into the larger national group.

Organizations Without Congress Affiliation

There have been significant changes among the unaffiliated unions. As noted above, the United Mine Workers of America was added to this category, and there was also an increase in the membership of the four railway brotherhoods where the trainmen's brotherhood alone gained 1,300 members. On the other hand, there was some decrease as a result of the amalgamation of several independent unions with affiliated unions. The most important of these was the merger of the United Gas, Coke and Chemical Workers, which had had no Canadian affiliation, with the Oil Workers International Union, which had CCL affiliation. The net result was an increase of about 20,000 members for the unions without Canadian affiliation.

ORGANIZATIONS OF CANADIAN LABOUR

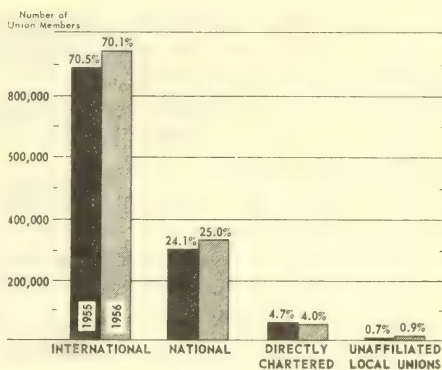

As can be seen in Table 3 Canadian trade union members belong to 178 national and international unions, 383 directly chartered locals and 55 unaffiliated local unions. The predominant form is the international union and this type accounts for 70 per cent of the total membership in the country. Increases in number were recorded for all types of organizations except for the directly chartered locals whose membership dropped by about 6,000. This was largely due to the transfer of these locals from the Congress to its member unions.

Unions

As a result of union mergers, there were fewer active unions in Canada at January 1, 1956 than a year previously. The significant mergers were as follows:

2 Unaffiliated Local Unions)	The Canadian Council
4 AFL Directly Chartered Local)	of Authors and Artists

The advance in union membership during 1955 appears to have been fairly well distributed among the unions. The two largest increases were reported by the United Steelworkers of America and the United Automobile Workers of America, which took in 10,000 and 5,000 new members respectively. Increased employment in the industries organized by these unions was largely responsible for these gains.

Some decreases were recorded but these were not large. For example, the Railway Carmen lost 2,000 of its members as a result of reduced employment in the railway shops across the country. A loss of approximately 1,900 members was also reported by the International Association of Machinists.

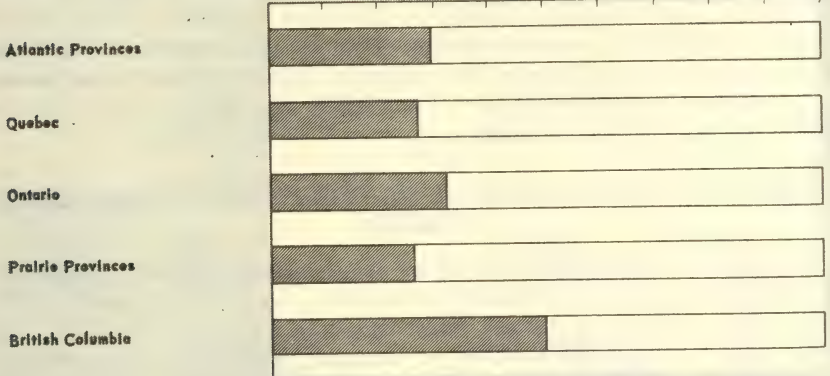

The most outstanding changes at the union level concerned the unions covering public service employees. About 22,000 public service employees joined unions this year and more than doubled the previous membership. The National Union of Public Service Employees, which was the CCL union for service employees, added 13,000 to its 3,300 members and most of these new members joined in a single group of 10,000 Ontario Hydro Workers. The TLC affiliate, the National Union of Public Employees, had its origin in the 18,000 members of the directly chartered locals which were assigned to it in 1954. This year they have added a further 8,000 members and their new total of 26,000 workers makes them the second national union in Canada to have over 25,000 members. The assignment of directly chartered locals represented an important step in the TLC's lengthy history of organizing public service employees.

The advances in union membership resulted in some interesting changes in the size distribution of unions as shown in Table 4. The activities of the National Union of Public Employees, as noted above, resulted in Canada having for the first time two national unions with more than 25,000 members. Another noteworthy feature is the increase in the number of unions which have between 10,000 and 15,000 workers. This came about because of the large gains made by unions who were in the 5,000 to 10,000 membership class last year but have moved up a class this year.

Locals

There were 359 new locals established in Canada during the twelve-month period, but 270 became inactive and the net increase was only 89. As in past years, locals of less than 700 members account for approximately half of the union membership in Canada, and there are only 18 locals with more than 5,000 members, only 4 of which have more than 10,000 members. The concentration indicated by these four large locals is somewhat overstated for two of them. The 10,450 members of the Seafarers International Union are listed as belonging to a single unit, even though they are scattered geographically. Similarly, the 10,000-member local of the National Union of Public Service Employees embraces Ontario Hydro workers located throughout the province. The two largest locals have around 16,000 members; one is a UAW local at Windsor and the other is a Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers local at Sudbury.

The substantial increases in union membership appear to have taken place among the larger locals. For example, 143,000 of the union members in Canada are in locals of more than 5,000 as compared with last year when there were 117,000 members in locals of this size.

GEOGRAPHIC AND INDUSTRIAL DISTRIBUTION OF TRADE UNION MEMBERS

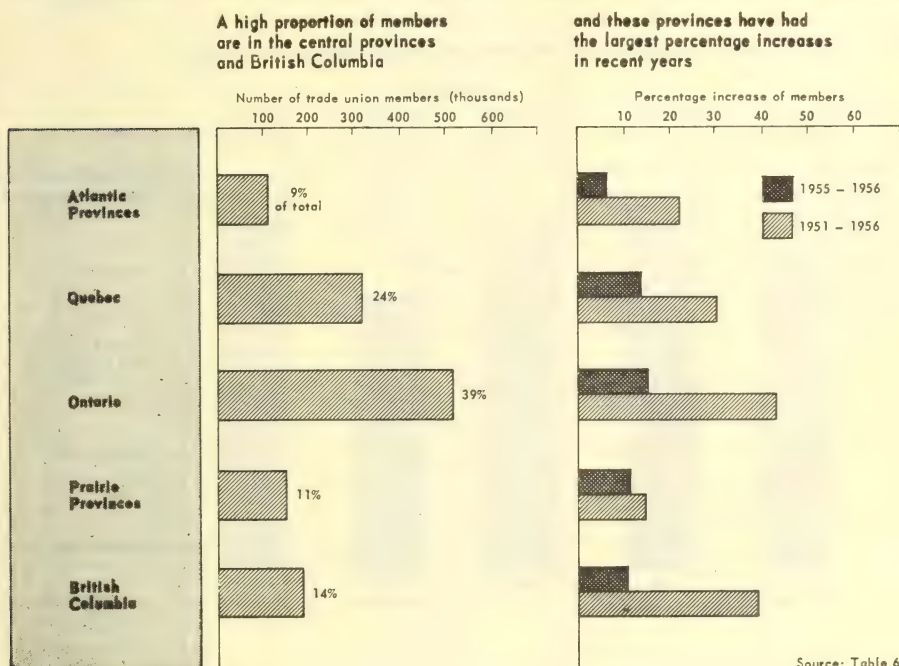

Based on information supplied by local unions, a study was made of the distribution of union members by industry, by province, and by labour market area and the results are summarized in Tables 5, 6 and 7. Nearly 33 per cent of the paid workers in Canada belong to trade unions, but organization has not proceeded uniformly and the distribution that underlies the national average is complex. Two measures of organization are possible and either the number of trade union members or the proportion of paid workers organized may be used. Both of these vary for the different sectors, but not in a consistent pattern, and the areas which account for the greatest proportion of trade union members are not necessarily the areas which are most highly organized.

Provinces

Union membership is highly concentrated in the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. These provinces taken together contain nearly two-thirds of the total Canadian membership and the increases which have occurred during recent years have tended to re-inforce this concentration. Their predominance in the labour movement appears to stem mostly from their large population—they have slightly over two-thirds of the nation's paid workers—for they are not the most highly organized areas in Canada. Measured in terms of the proportion of paid workers who belong to unions, the most highly organized areas are the provinces of British Columbia and Newfoundland where about half of the paid workers are trade union members.

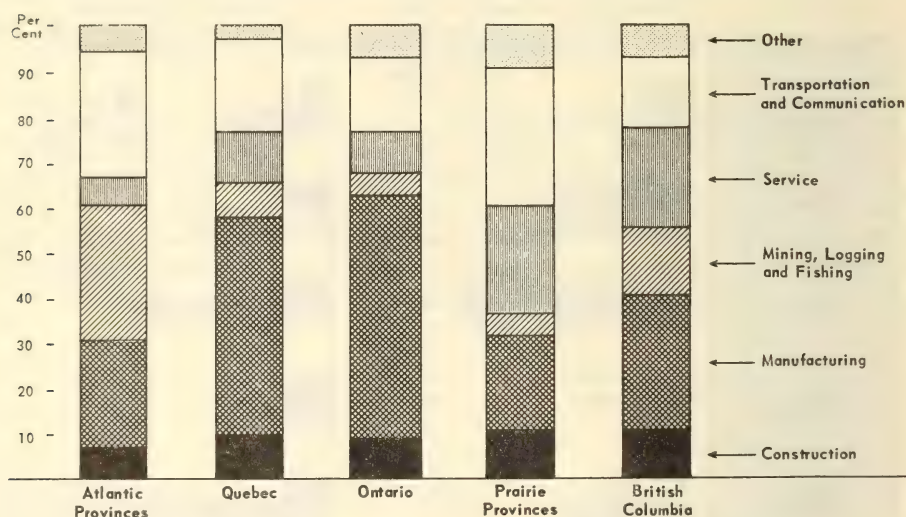

Industries

The degree of organization varies more widely for industrial groups than it does for provinces and there are some striking differences in the proportion of total union members found in some industries as compared to its share of paid workers. The most highly organized industry is transportation where nearly three out of every four workers belong to trade unions. This industry has about 21 per cent of the total Canadian membership and is the second largest component in the national labour movement. The largest is manufacturing where over 40 per cent of the union members in Canada are employed, and the proportion of its workers who belong to trade unions is above the Canadian average. In contrast to this, trade and service have only 15 per cent of the Canadian union membership even though they have almost as many paid workers as transportation and manufacturing combined.

Industrial Composition of Trade Union Members for the Regions

Workers in manufacturing form an important part of trade union membership in each of the regions, although this is obviously more so for the central provinces than it is for the rest of Canada. Half of the trade union members in Ontario and Quebec are employed in manufacturing industries, while in the other regions the proportion falls to somewhere between 20 and 30 per cent. In Western Canada this gap is made up by service workers and on the Atlantic Coast it is the primary industries of logging, fishing and mining which are important. The proportion of construction workers who belong to trade unions varies considerably for the different regions of the country, yet the construction industry is a consistent field of organization and accounts for about 10 per cent of the union members in each of the provinces. In contrast to this, transportation which is very highly organized in every region of Canada accounts for a varying proportion of trade union members ranging from 15 to 30 per cent.

The industrial composition of the trade union membership varies from region to region

Labour Market Areas

Most of the trade union members in Canada work in the nation's large industrial centres. The eight labour market areas which have over 100,000 paid workers account for one-half of the country's union members and the Montreal and Toronto areas alone have over one-quarter of the total. Yet these are not the most highly organized areas of Canada for the proportion of paid workers who belong to trade unions is higher in the labour market areas which have less than 100,000 workers and appears to rise as the areas become smaller.

The degree of organization varies from area to area, but most of Canada's workers are employed in places where the proportion organized is from 20 to 30 per cent. Twenty-nine of the 64 labour market areas listed in Table 7 fall in this category and these account for two-thirds of Canadian paid workers

PRINCIPAL STATISTICS OF LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA IN 1956

The information contained in this statistical summary has been gathered through two sets of questionnaires. The first questionnaire, which gave rise to tables 1 - 4 inclusive and tables 8 and 9, was completed by national and international union officers. Tables 5 to 7 inclusive are derived from information supplied on a second questionnaire by local union secretaries throughout Canada. The total membership reported through local union branches is 96.1% of that reported by the parent unions and included information on the geographic location of the membership as well as the employer or employers of the majority of the members in the local.

INTRODUCTION

The forty-sixth annual report on labour organization in Canada contains the results of the 1957 survey of union membership carried out by the Canadian Department of Labour.

The report has two main sections. The first offers a statistical analysis of union membership by affiliation, industry and geographic area. In the second section, the report presents a directory of labour organizations, setting forth their principal officers, publications, and the location of Canadian branches.

The information contained in the report has been gathered through two sets of questionnaires.

The first questionnaire, completed by the national or international officers of the union, gives rise to figures showing the total membership claimed by the unions active in this country, the distribution of members through the various unions, and the affiliation of these unions with labour congresses.

Since many unions are active in a variety of industries, the returns from this questionnaire cannot be used to determine the industrial distribution of union members. Such information is derived from a second questionnaire, sent to local union secretaries. The returns for this second part of the survey also make possible the compilation of tables on the geographic location of union members, and are useful in general as a supplement to the information derived from the first questionnaire. They are, however, somewhat incomplete, being based on returns from the locals known to exist in Canada.

The information contained in the present Report represents the continuation of work begun soon after the founding of the Department of Labour in 1900. Although the first Annual Report with statistical and descriptive material was not issued until 1911, information appeared periodically in the Labour Gazette over the previous decade.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA - 1957

Statistical tables will be found in the section entitled "Principal Statistics of Labour Organization in Canada in 1957" starting on page 9.

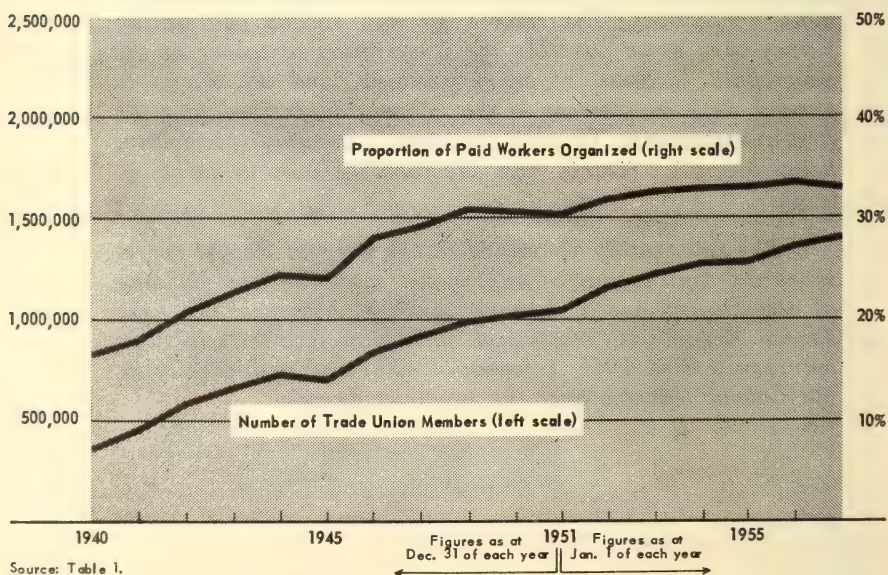

The 1957 survey of Labour Organization in Canada, carried out just seven months after three-quarters of Canadian union members realigned themselves nationally to form the Canadian Labour Congress, reveals much of the new shape of the country's labour organization. It shows that the national merger has been followed by amalgamation of secondary bodies at the provincial and local levels.

Since 1950 the proportion of trade union members to non-agricultural paid workers has remained close to one in three. Each year the proportion has been within one or two per cent of this figure, and in January 1957 it stood at 32.8 per cent or .5 per cent lower than a year ago. There was, nevertheless a $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent membership increase over the past year, bringing the total to approximately 1,386,000. (Table 1).

It is the larger unions, those with more than 10,000 members, who have contributed most to the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent increase. They were responsible for over three-quarters of the total membership growth. Similarly, most of the declines in membership occurred in unions of 10,000 or more members.

As a first step in the analysis of the 1957 figures the significant over-all results can be drawn together. Each item will be discussed separately below:

SINCE 1940, THE PROPORTION OF NON-AGRICULTURAL PAID WORKERS ORGANIZED HAS ALMOST DOUBLED.

- (a) The Canadian Labour Congress increased its membership by 40,000.
- (b) Affiliation of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen with the Canadian Labour Congress reduced the size of the independent railway brotherhood group by 10,000.
- (c) There were, at August 1957, 6 fewer provincial federations and 25 fewer local labour councils than a year ago.
- (d) The number of unions active in Canada decreased by seven.
- (e) International unions gained 43,000 new members.
- (f) National union membership changed little from last year.
- (g) The Province of Ontario recorded the largest increase in union membership.
- (h) The largest labour market gain was in Hamilton, where some 9,000 members were added.
- (i) By industrial groups, the largest change was in manufacturing, where the percentage of workers organized rose by two per cent.

National Affiliations

Recording of an over-all increase of 40,000 in the affiliated membership of the Canadian Labour Congress gives little indication of the important changes which have taken place within the organization. Not only have new members been added, but some affiliated unions have ceased to be active in Canada. Much has been accomplished in merging the two original series of provincial and local organizations, and important affiliations of formerly independent unions have taken place. (Table 2).

Major changes in the affiliates of the CLC are listed below. None of these involves large unions, but all the unions noted have participated over a number of years in the Canadian labour movement.

(1) Affiliation of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen with the CLC broke the traditional independence of the brotherhoods of railway operating trades which has existed since they first entered Canada in the 1860's. The brotherhood has also joined the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States.

(2) The most significant loss, numerically, to the CLC was the 8,000 member British Columbia Teachers' Federation which withdrew its affiliation and has been dropped from the labour organization survey. (Groups representing government and professional employees are included in the survey only insofar as they are affiliated with major labour congresses.)

(3) Loss of a representation vote for workers at the Kitimat plant of the Aluminum Company of Canada has eliminated the Canadian membership of the Aluminum Workers International Union. The workers at Kitimat are now represented by the United Steelworkers of America, and in Quebec the Company's employees belong to syndicates of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour.

- Local The basic unit of labour organization formed in a particular plant or locality. The membership participate directly in the affairs of their organization including the election of local officers, financial and other business matters of the local, the relations between their employers and the local and pay their dues to the local. Locals may be of three types — a local of an international or national union, a directly chartered local or an independent local.
- Local of an International or National Union A local which is organized by or elects to affiliate itself with an international or national union. Per capita taxes are paid to the parent union and in return certain services are rendered by the union.
- Directly Chartered Local A local which is organized by and receives its charter from a central labour congress and is not part of an international or national union. It pays per capita dues directly to the congress and receives services from the congress.
- Unaffiliated Local Union or Association A local which is not formally connected or affiliated with any other labour organization.
- Union The unit of labour organization which organizes and charters locals in the industries or trades as defined in its constitution, sets general policy for its locals, assists them in the conduct of their affairs, and is the medium for co-ordinating their activities. Finances are obtained from the locals through per capita dues. Unions usually hold regular conventions of delegates from the locals at which general policy is set and at which officers are elected.
- International Union A union which charters locals in the United States and Canada.
- National Union A union which charters locals in Canada only.
- Affiliated Union A union which is affiliated with a central labour congress.
- District Council An organization of locals of a union in a particular area formed to co-ordinate the activities and administer to the needs of the locals in the district. District councils may hold meetings of delegates from member locals to deal with matters of interest to them and at which officers for the district are elected. District organizations are also known as "joint boards" or "conference boards".
- Allied Trades Federation An organization of unions, or of locals of unions in a particular area, functioning in the same industry to co-ordinate the activities of the members and to deal with jurisdictional questions. Policies are established and officers are elected at meetings attended by delegates from member organizations. Trades federations may be known by other names such as "union councils", "union federations", "joint councils", and they are most frequently found in industries organized along craft lines.
- Central Labour Congress An organization having in affiliation various unions, directly chartered locals, provincial federations of labour, and local labour councils, for the purpose of broadly co-ordinating their activities at the national level including the relations between unions and governments and of establishing relations with organized workers internationally. Congresses hold annual conventions attended by delegates from affiliated organizations at which policies are established and officers elected. The congress also organizes local unions known as directly chartered locals. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on all affiliates.
- Provincial Federation An organization formed by a labour congress at the provincial level which has in affiliation the members of that congress in the province. It is organized and functions similarly to the congress in the appropriate provincial area only, except that it does not charter local unions. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.
- Local Labour Council An organization formed by a labour congress at the city level. It is organized and functions in the same manner as a provincial federation but within the scope of a city. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.

(4) Another international union with CLC affiliation which withdrew from Canada in the past year was the United Stone and Allied Products Workers of America. This union chartered two small locals in Nova Scotia in 1938. One of these ceased to operate in 1943 and the other, which reported 24 members a year ago, has now been dissolved.

The "goings and comings" of the unions mentioned above resulted in little net change in the membership of the CLC; the substantial growth in Congress membership originated with established CLC affiliates. Few of these changes were large, the most outstanding being the increase of 11,300 in the membership of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners. The National Union of Public Employees added 4,400 members, the International Hod Carriers reported an increase of 4,100 and the International Woodworkers added 3,600 to their membership. These, however, were the only changes of more than 3,000 in the membership of CLC unions. (Table 3).

There was also some shifting of membership within the Congress originating with the directly chartered groups, 41 of which were transferred to the National Union of Public Employees. An additional union, the British Columbia Federation of Peace Officers, was formed out of some formerly directly chartered locals. Some 38 new directly chartered locals were founded in the past year, with a total membership of close to 1,400.

At its formation the CLC inherited from the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour an organization of 16 provincial federations and 122 local labour councils. In part, these groups were complementary in that they were established by the two congresses in different parts of the country. This was the case with 39 local councils of the TLC and 15 from the CCL. Many of the organizations, however, duplicated one another and by the terms of the merger they were required to form a single organization. A count showed that parallel organizations of the TLC and CCL existed in seven provincial federations and 34 local labour councils. Although two years were allowed for re-grouping, considerable progress has been made during the past year and at August, 1957, there were only ten provincial federations, with a merger still to come of the two groups in New Brunswick. At the local level, by August, 1957, the number of local labour councils had been reduced to 97 and in only six cases were there two councils in the same locality.

At the merger convention there were plans set forth to bring many unaffiliated groups into the CLC. An agreement was made to admit the One Big Union into affiliation on the understanding that its membership would be distributed among the appropriate CLC unions. The OBU had been an independent organization in the western provinces since 1919, when it was formed by a group of unionists who broke away from the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada. A substantial decrease is reported this year in the membership of the OBU, reflecting the steps taken to carry out this agreement. The affiliation of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen has been followed this year by the application of a second independent railway brotherhood, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, for affiliation with the CLC. In August, 1957, the executive council of the CLC approved the affiliation but the change has not been shown in this year's report. Throughout the past year, discussions have continued with the executive of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour respecting the possible affiliation of this group. Certain organizational changes have been requested as a condition of admission to the CLC and a convention of the CCCL is to decide on its future.

The CCCL has reported a decrease of close to 2,000 in membership during the past year. Even though seven of the "federations" showed a total increase of some 3,100 members, four "federations", combined with the directly chartered group, lost a total of 5,000 members. The Pulp and Paper Federation lost most, with some 2,000 fewer members, and the Hosiery Workers Federation was disbanded, with only part of its membership transferred to the Clothing Workers Federation with which it was officially merged.

Unions

Examination of individual unions indicates further the character of change in union membership over the past year.

By size of union, the pattern of recent years is repeated — the major increases have occurred among the 42 unions having 10,000 or more members. While there was one less union in this group than last year, their total membership was 30,000 above a year ago. (Table 4).

The large advance in the membership of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners has made it the second largest union in Canada. The United Steelworkers of America with some 70,000 members remains the largest union and the United Automobile Workers reporting a decrease of 5,000 members became the third largest in the country. (Table 8).

The number of unions reporting in 1957 decreased by seven over a year ago. Some of the unions which have ceased activity in Canada are discussed above. All the other unions which ceased to operate were small, but one deserves particular mention — The Canadian Brussels Carpet Weavers Benefit Association. This union, which has now joined the Textile Workers Union of America, has been listed in the Labour Organization Report since the first issue in 1911. It was then a local of the United Textile Workers of America but in 1919 became an independent union. Locals of the union were found at various times in Brantford, Guelph and Toronto but membership seldom exceeded 200 to 300.

As may be expected, the major numerical gains were made by the international unions. International unions continue to account for approximately 71 per cent of Canada's labour movement. For the most part these unions are affiliated with the CLC in Canada and the AFL-CIO in the United States. But some seven per cent of union members in Canada were represented by international unions which have no such affiliation. No large changes in membership were reported by this group. There has been little change, for example, in the independent railroad brotherhoods other than that caused by the transfer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen to the CLC. In addition, other independent international unions, mainly those expelled from the national congresses, have not changed membership markedly in the past year, although advances of 1,500 and 1,000 were reported by the United Electrical Workers and Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers respectively.

There was a slight decrease reported in the over-all membership of national unions, but in fact the most interesting change of the year occurred within the latter group, where for the first time there were two unions of more than 30,000 members. The Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees was the first national union to pass the 30,000 mark back in 1947 and is still the largest national union. The National Union of Public Employees, created some two years ago on the basis of the organizational work of the Trades and Labor Congress in the field of municipal employees has been the second national union to reach this size. The union added 4,400 members in the past year and now has 30,300 members.

Geographic Distribution

Geographically, the picture of union membership does not appear to have changed greatly over the past year. With the exception of Ontario, changes in membership appear to have been little more than sufficient to keep pace with the growth of the labour force. Newfoundland and British Columbia continue to have a union membership equal to about one-half of their non-agricultural paid workers, and the Maritime Provinces and Quebec maintained a one to four ratio. Ontario has consistently been closest to the national average in the proportion of workers organized. This year the proportion organized in the province advanced a full percentage point above last year's figure to 32.5 per cent. (Table 7).

During the past year unions in Ontario had by far the largest gain in membership adding some 49,000 in total. The same story is told in the formation of new locals — Ontario accounted for 89 locals and 17,000 members of the 252 locals and 28,000 members added by new organizations during the year. No single union was responsible for this activity but five unions, including the United Steelworkers and the Textile Workers Union of America, accounted for fifty per cent of the over-all membership advance. It is also noteworthy that the additional Ontario members came from generally well organized industries such as iron and steel, textiles and logging.

Again, by labour market areas, the major changes were in areas having the largest number of members. Areas already having more than 3,000 members gave rise to over 70 per cent of the increase for the year. Hamilton, Ontario, showed the largest gain — some 9,000 members — and Central Vancouver Island the greatest loss — some 3,000 members. (Table 6).

Industrial Distribution

A picture of relative stability in the proportion of paid workers organized is provided by this year's estimates of distribution by industry. None of the industrial groups showed a change of more than 2 per cent over last year in the proportion of paid workers organized. (Table 5).

Perhaps the outstanding change in the industrial distribution over the past few years has been the rapid rise in the number of union members in the service industries. The labour force in this group has increased by one-third since 1950 and the proportion of the workers organized has held and, in fact, advanced from one in seven to one in six. The industry remains among the most poorly organized in Canada but the constant extension of organization, particularly among employees in Government Service, has been the feature of the past five years.

Similarly, the construction industry has been marked over the past few years by an expanding labour force and an increasing degree of organization. As a result, the proportion organized has changed from less than one in four to almost one in three.

The manufacturing industries continued to give rise to over 40 per cent of Canada's union membership, even though it is not the most highly organized industry. With slightly more than 40 per cent organized, the workers in the manufacturing industries are in approximately the same position as those in public utilities, forestry and construction. But they are far behind the 70 per cent organized work force of the transportation industry.

In the past year manufacturing made the greatest gains in membership, adding some 38,000 members. These new members represent further gains in industries already having sizeable union memberships such as textiles, pulp and paper, and iron and steel. Few large gains were made in less highly organized sections such as petroleum and coal products or wood products.

PRINCIPAL STATISTICS OF LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA IN 1957

The information contained in this statistical summary has been gathered through two sets of questionnaires. The first questionnaire, which gave rise to tables 1-4 inclusive and tables 8 and 9 was completed by national and international union officers. Tables 5-7 inclusive are derived from information supplied on a second questionnaire by local union secretaries throughout Canada. The total membership reported through local branches is slightly less than than reported by the parent unions and includes information on the geographic location of the membership as well as the industry in which the majority of the members of the local are employed.

FOREWORD

This edition of Labour Organization in Canada contains the results of the 1958 survey of union membership carried out by the Economics and Research Branch of the Canadian Department of Labour.

The first section of this publication contains statistical data on union membership by affiliation, industry and geographic area. The second section is a directory of labour organizations which sets forth their principal officers, publications and the location of Canadian branches.

The information for this edition has been gathered through two sets of questionnaires.

The first questionnaire, completed by the national or international union headquarters, was the source for figures showing the total membership claimed by unions active in Canada, and the distribution of membership by union and congress affiliation.

Information on the industrial and geographic distribution of union membership in Canada was derived from a second questionnaire which was sent out to all known local union secretaries. The second series of statistics required contact with thousands of locals not all of which supplied the requested information.

This edition of Labour Organization in Canada represents the continuation of work begun soon after the establishment of the Department of Labour in 1900. Although the first Annual Report with statistical descriptive material was not issued until 1911, information appeared periodically in the Labour Gazette over the previous decade.

LABOUR ORGANIZATION IN CANADA – 1958

The 1958 survey of labour organization in Canada shows that there was little change in the extent of organization within the Canadian labour force over the previous year. The over-all increase of close to 68,000 members was spread widely among the unions active in Canada. In spite of employment decline in some Canadian industries during the year, the number of unions reporting decreases in membership was small and in only one case was it as high as 4,000 members.

The net result of increases and decreases within the various unions, however, served to keep the proportion of total non-agricultural paid workers belonging to unions at approximately the same level as in 1957, or 34.5 per cent.

Two substantial changes occurred in the affiliations of international unions. First, with the affiliation of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen to the Canadian Labour Congress, the traditionally independent group of railway brotherhoods, which up until two years ago comprised over 40,000 members, was reduced to less than 10,000. At the present time, from the original group of operating railway workers unions, only the engineers' and conductors' unions remain independent. The second noteworthy change in affiliation came about with the expulsion of two international unions from the Canadian Labour Congress. As a result, more union members now belong to unions without Canadian affiliation, but affiliated to the American Federation of Labour and Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States.

Few significant changes were reported in the industrial and geographic distribution of union membership. Transportation and communication continued to be the most highly organized of Canadian industries. The heavy emphasis of organisational efforts in the manufacturing and construction industries, traditional among American unions, has meant a concentration of membership, as in past years, in the more heavily industrialized areas of the country. The 1958 survey also indicates a continuation of union membership growth in such industries as service and trade and finance (Table 5). Such workers now represent a significant proportion of organized labour in Canada.

International union membership increased slightly more than over-all union membership. (International union membership increased by 72,000 and total union membership increased by 68,000). There was a slight decrease in the membership of national unions which was accounted for by a loss of some 8,000 members in national organizations within the Canadian Labour Congress as well as in a number of independent un-affiliated national unions.

Canadian Labour Congress

An over-all increase of some 74,000 members in unions affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress was recorded in the survey. This increase was accounted for almost entirely by advances in membership reported by affiliated international unions. Affiliations and expulsions over the twelve-month period since the last survey almost balanced one another.

The new affiliate is the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen which joined the AFL-CIO in the United States and the CLC, in the latter case bringing in approximately 24,000 new members. The membership advance resulting from the new affiliate was offset by withdrawals from the Congress. The Operating Engineers with 15,000 members, and the Technical Engineers with 1,000 members, were formally expelled from the CLC. The Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, with approximately 11,000 members, left the CLC when they joined with the Civil Service Association of Ottawa to form the Civil Service Association of Canada, an independent national organization.

The two unions expelled from the CLC retained affiliation with the AFL-CIO in the United States. This, of course, brought a substantial increase in the number of union members in Canada which held affiliation with the United States labor congress, but not with the Canadian congress. A reversal of this situation is noted in the International Teamsters' Union which was expelled from the United States central labor body after an investigation of charges of violation of the Ethical Practice Code of the AFL-CIO. As a result, the Teamsters' union stands as the only large international organization holding affiliation in Canada but not in the United States.

The 1958 labour organization survey, taken eighteen months after the establishment of the Canadian Labour Congress, indicates that much has been done to consolidate the larger organization which grew out of the amalgamation of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. In the 1957 survey, it was indicated that there were still some duplications of provincial federations and of local labour councils. The 1958 survey indicates that all such duplication has been removed and that there now exist within the Canadian Labour Congress nine provincial federations and 96 local labour councils.

Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour reported an increase of close to 5,000 members over the year, bringing its total membership up 4.9 per cent to slightly over 104,000. The most significant change was the reduction to 13 of the number of Federations within the CCCL as a result of the break-up of the 3,200-member National Federation of Chemical Workers. However, not all 3,200 members of the Chemical Federation were lost to the CCCL as many of the locals retained status as directly chartered local unions under CCCL jurisdiction. Another notable change in CCCL organization and structure over the year was the creation of 14 new locals within the thirteen Federations, with a total membership of approximately 2,000. The creation of 24 directly chartered locals, with a membership of some 7,000, offset by a wide margin the recorded lag within the federations (Table 3).

Unions

The United Steelworkers of America, with some 80,000 members, remains the largest union in Canada. Recording the largest union membership growth for any union in the country (8,000), the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners has retained its position as the second largest union in Canada, and the United Automobile Workers, reporting no change in its membership, remains the third largest union. The Teamsters' union, with an increase of over 7,000 new members, showed the second highest increase and is now the sixth largest union in the country (Table 8).

The Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees remains the largest national union in the country. The National Union of Public Employees reported the largest increase among national unions (5,000) to bring its total membership over the 35,000 mark, just 500 behind the CBRE. Among other significant shifts in national union membership was the 2,000 membership rise in the National Union of Public Service Employees and a 2,500 membership increase in the now 8,000 strong Newfoundland Federation of Fishermen. Unions reporting substantial losses were the Catholic Union of Farmers (Forestry Service), with a loss of some 4,000 and the National Federation of Pulp and Paper Workers with a reduction of 1,000 (Table 9).

In spite of increases among Canada's largest unions, it is significant that the largest membership advance was among unions having from 5,000 to 15,000 members (Table 4). There are some 50 unions in this group and 22 of them combined to give an increase of 30,000, or close to one-half of the total increase in union membership during the twelve-month period. Nevertheless, the most prominent shift among the changes in the size distribution indicated in Table 4 was that made by the Brotherhood of Teamsters whose membership, as has already been noted, increased by 7,000 during the year to bring it up above the 30,000 level, making a total of ten unions in Canada with more than 30,000 members.

Decreases were reported this year by some 29 unions, but it is to be noted that more than half of these unions were in the group having less than 5,000 members. The total membership of the smaller unions in Canada has decreased slightly, leaving a greater proportion of union members in the larger unions.

Geographic and Industrial Distribution of Trade Union Membership

Although approximately one-third of paid workers belong to unions, there is no uniform pattern of organization across the country. Some industries are more highly organized than others, and the degree of organization in any one area will depend on the nature of its industry. Very often, therefore, the areas which account for the greatest proportion of trade union members are not the areas which are the most highly organized in proportion to their total working force. Toronto and Montreal, for example, though accounting for a high proportion of the total union membership in the country, are not highly organized. In some small communities, however, where a single industry provides the major source of employment, the labour force may well be highly organized and yet constitute but a small proportion of total union membership for the country as a whole.

The parallel between union membership and industrialization is borne out clearly in Table 7 which presents a provincial breakdown of membership. The central and industrialized provinces of Ontario and Quebec account for 58 per cent of total union membership in Canada. Ontario, with 37 per cent of Canada's non-agricultural paid workers, has approximately 38 per cent of total union membership. On the other hand, when measured in terms of the proportion of paid workers which belongs to unions, the most highly organized provinces have traditionally been British Columbia and Newfoundland.

The provincial breakdown of membership figures does not show any marked change in any of the provinces, with the possible exception of Quebec, where some large locals in the province did not respond to the survey this year. In spite of a drop in reported figures for Quebec, it has already been noted that the activities of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, especially as reflected in the directly chartered unions, have brought new membership into the province.

The figures of membership by labour market area also indicate some slight drop in the Quebec region. The Montreal labour market area has given up its place as the greatest contributor to trade union membership in favour of Toronto. Membership in Toronto has increased by over 10,000 during the past year, and a larger drop was indicated in the Montreal figures, although, as has been stated earlier, not all of the important locals are included in the latter figure. Montreal and Toronto combined, however, still represent over one-quarter of the total membership in Canada.

A year-to-year comparison of the figures in Table 5 does not indicate any major increases in the number of workers organized in the various industries in Canada (Table 5). On a more long-run basis, however, there has been an interesting shift in the percentage of trade union membership coming from the various industries. Manufacturing and transportation have traditionally been the major contributors to union membership in Canada, and in the latest survey they make up 40 per cent and 20 per cent of membership, respectively. This percentage has, however, been dropping gradually as union membership has increased in other industries. In 1955, manufacturing accounted for 43 per cent of union membership and transportation and communication 22 per cent, and in 1950 the figures were 44 and 24, respectively. The major change has been the growing share of the service industries which now account for 11 per cent of total union membership. The expansion of unions in municipal organizations as well as provincial enterprises has brought this group of unions into greater prominence.

Nevertheless, there have been no shifts in the extent of organization within industries. The proportion of paid workers organized in the broad industrial divisions is as follows:

Less than 33 Per Cent	33 Per Cent to 66 Per Cent	Over 66 Per Cent
Service	Mining	Transportation and
Trade	Construction	Communication
Finance	Public Utilities

GLOSSARY

- Local The basic unit of labour organization formed in a particular plant or locality. The membership participate directly in the affairs of their organization including the election of local officers, financial and other business matters of the local, the relations between their employers and the local and pay their dues to the local. Locals may be of three types — a local of an international or national union, a directly chartered local or an independent local.
- Local of an International or National Union A local which is organized by or elects to affiliate itself with an international or national union. Per capita taxes are paid to the parent union and in return certain services are rendered by the union.
- Directly Chartered Local A local which is organized by and receives its charter from a central labour congress and is not part of an international or national union. It pays per capita dues directly to the congress and receives services from the congress.
- Unaffiliated Local Union or Association A local which is not formally connected or affiliated with any other labour organization.
- Union The unit of labour organization which organizes and charters locals in the industries or trades as defined in its constitution, sets general policy for its locals, assists them in the conduct of their affairs, and is the medium for co-ordinating their activities. Finances are obtained from the locals through per capita dues. Unions usually hold regular conventions of delegates from the locals at which general policy is set and at which officers are elected.
- International Union A union which charters locals in the United States and Canada.
- National Union A union which charters locals in Canada only.
- Affiliated Union A union which is affiliated with a central labour congress.
- District Council An organization of locals of a union in a particular area formed to co-ordinate the activities and administer to the needs of the locals in the district. District councils may hold meetings of delegates from member locals to deal with matters of interest to them and at which officers for the district are elected. District organizations are also known as "joint boards" or "conference boards".
- Allied Trades Federation An organization of unions, or of locals of unions in a particular area, functioning in the same industry to co-ordinate the activities of the members and to deal with jurisdictional questions. Policies are established and officers are elected at meetings attended by delegates from member organizations. Trades federations may be known by other names such as "union councils", "union federations", "joint councils", and they are most frequently found in industries organized along craft lines.
- Central Labour Congress An organization having in affiliation various unions, directly chartered locals, provincial federations of labour, and local labour councils, for the purpose of broadly co-ordinating their activities at the national level including the relations between unions and governments and of establishing relations with organized workers internationally. Congresses hold annual conventions attended by delegates from affiliated organizations at which policies are established and officers elected. The congress also organizes local unions known as directly chartered locals. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on all affiliates.
- Provincial Federation An organization formed by a labour congress at the provincial level which has in affiliation the members of that congress in the province. It is organized and functions similarly to the congress in the appropriate provincial area only, except that it does not charter local unions. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.
- Local Labour Council An organization formed by a labour congress at the city level. It is organized and functions in the same manner as a provincial federation but within the scope of a city. Finances are obtained through a per capita tax on affiliates.
